Except the simple and ordinary kinds of household manufacture, or those for which there are very commanding local advantages, pecuniary bounties are in most cases indispensable to the introduction of a new branch. A stimulus and support not less powerful and direct is, generally speaking, essential to the overcoming of the obstacles which arise from the competitions of superior skill and maturity elsewhere. Bounties are especially essential, in regard to articles upon which these foreigners who have been accustomed to supply a country, are in the practice of granting them.

The continuance of bounties on manufactures long established, must almost always be of questionable policy; because a presumption would arise in every such case, that there were natural and inherent impediments to success. But in new undertakings, they are as justifiable as they are ofentimes necessary. There is a degree of prejudice against bounties from an appearance of giving away the public money, without an immediate consideration, and from a supposition that they serve to enrich particular classes at the expense of the community. But neither of these sources of dislike will bear serious examination. There is no purpose to which public money can be more beneficially applied, than to the acquisition of a new and useful branch of industry—no consideration more valuable than a permanent addition to the general stock of productive labor.

As to the second source of objection, it equally lies against the other modes of encouragement which are admitted to be eligible. As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community, for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more. But it is the interest of the society, in each case, to submit to a temporary expense, which is more than compensated by an increase of industry and wealth, by an augmentation of resources and independence, and by the circumstance of eventual cheapness, which has been noticed in another place.

It would deserve attention, however, in the employment of this species of encouragement in the United States, as a reason for moderating the degree of it in the instances in which it might be deemed eligible, that the great distance of this country from Europe imposes very heavy charges on all the fabrics which are brought from thence, amounting from 15 to 30 per cent. on their value, according to their bulk.

A question has been made concerning the constitutional right of the Government of the United States to apply this species of encouragement, but there is certainly no good foundation for such a question. The National Legislature has express authority "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," with no other qualifications than that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;" that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration, taken on the principles prescribed in the Constitution, and that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite; and the objects to which it may be appropriated are no less comprehensive, than the payment of the public debts, and the providing for the common defence and general welfare. The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise, numerous exigencies, incident to the affairs of a nation, would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used; because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues, should have been restricted within narrower limits than the "general welfare;" and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars, which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition. It is therefore, of necessity, left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper; and there seems to be no room for a doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, are within the sphere of the National Councils, as far as regards an application of money.

The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question, which seems to be admissible, is this: That the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made, be general, and not local; its operation extending, in fact or by possibility, throughout the Union, and not being confined to a particular spot.

No objection ought to arise to this construction from a supposition that it would imply a power to do whatever else should appear to Congress conducive to the general welfare. A power to appropriate money with this latitude, which is granted, too, in express terms, would not carry a power to do any other thing, not authorized in the Constitution, either expressly or by fair implication.

V. Premiums.

These are of a nature allied to bounties, though distinguishable from them in some important features.

Bounties are applicable to the whole quantity of an article produced, or manufactured, or exported, and involve a correspondent expense. Premiums serve to reward some particular excellence or superiority, some extraordinary exertion or skill, and are dispensed only in a small number of cases. But their effect is to stimulate general effort: contrived so as to be both honorary and lucrative, they address themselves to different passions, touching the chords as well of emulation as interest. They are accordingly a very economical mean of exciting the enterprise of a whole community.

There are various societies in different countries, whose object is the dispensation of premiums for the encouragement of agriculture, arts, manufactures, and commerce; and though they are, for the most part, voluntary associations, with comparatively slender funds, their utility has been immense. Much has been done by this mean in Great Britain. Scotland, in particular, owes materially to it a prodigious amelioration of condition. From a similar establishment in the United States, supplied and supported by the Government of the Union, vast benefits might reasonably be expected.

Report on Manufactures.

Some further ideas on this head, shall accordingly be submitted, in the conclusion of this Report.

VI. The exemption of the materials of manufactures from duty.

The policy of that exemption as a general rule, particularly in reference to new establishments, is obvious. It can hardly ever be advisable to add the obstructions of fiscal burdens to the difficulties which naturally embarrass a new manufacture; and where it is matured, and in condition to become an object of revenue, it is, generally speaking, better that the fabric, than the material, should be the subject of taxation. Ideas of proportion between the quantum of the tax and the value of the article, can be more easily adjusted in the former than in the latter case. An argument for exemptions of this kind in the United States, is to be derived from the practice, as far as their necessities have permitted, of those nations whom we are to meet as competitors, in our own and in foreign markets.

There are, however, exceptions to it; of which some examples will be given under the next head.

The laws of the Union afford instances of the observance of the policy here recommended, but it will probably be found advisable to extend it to some other cases. Of a nature bearing some affinity to that policy is the regulation which exempts from duty the tools and implements, as well as the books, clothes, and household furniture, of foreign artists, who come to reside in the United States; an advantage already secured to them by the laws of the Union, and which it is, in every view, proper to continue.

VII. Drawbacks of the duties which are imposed on the materials of manufactures.

It has already been observed, as a general rule, that duties on those materials ought, with certain exceptions, to be forborne. Of these exceptions, three cases occur, which may serve as examples: One, where the material is itself an object of general or extensive consumption, and a fit and productive source of revenue. Another, where a manufacture of a simpler kind, the competition of which with a like domestic article is desired to be restrained, partakes of the nature of a raw material, from being capable, by a further process, to be converted into a manufacture of a different kind, the introduction or growth of which is desired to be encouraged. A third, where the material itself is a production of the country, and in sufficient abundance to furnish a cheap and plentiful supply to the national manufacturers.

Under the first description comes the article of molasses. It is not only a fair object of revenue, but being a sweet, it is just that the consumers of it should pay a duty as well as the consumers of sugar.

Cottons and linen, in their white state, fall under the second description; a duty upon such as are imported is proper, to promote the domestic manufacture of similar articles in the same state; a drawback of that duty is proper, to encourage the printing and staining at home of those which are brought from abroad. When the first of these manufactures has attained sufficient maturity in a country to furnish a full supply for the second, the utility of the drawback ceases.

The article of hemp, either now does or may be expected soon to exemplify the third case, in the United States.

Where duties on the materials of manufactures are not laid for the purpose of preventing a competition with some domestic production, the same reasons which recommend, as a general rule, the exemption of those materials from duties, would recommend as a like general rule, the allowance of drawbacks, in favor of the manufacturer. Accordingly, such drawbacks are familiar in countries which systematically pursue the business of manufactures; which furnishes an argument for the observance of a similar policy in the United States; and the idea has been adopted by the laws of the Union, in the instances of salt and molasses. It is believed that it will be found advantageous to extend it to some other articles.

VIII. The encouragement of new inventions and discoveries, at home, and of the introduction into the United States of such as may have been made in other countries, particularly those which relate to machinery.

This is among the most useful and unexceptionable of the aids which can be given to manufactures. The usual means of that encouragement are pecuniary rewards, and, for a time, exclusive privileges. The first must be employed according to the occasion and the utility of the invention or discovery. For the last, so far as respects "authors and inventors," provision has been made by law. But it is desirable, in regard to improvements and secrets of extraordinary value, to be able to extend the same benefit to introducers, as well as authors and inventors; a policy which has been practised with advantage in other countries. Here, however, as in some other cases, there is cause to regret that the competency of the authority of the National Government to the good which might be done, is not without a question. Many aids might be given to industry, many internal improvements of primary magnitude might be promoted, by an authority operating throughout the Union; which cannot be effected as well, if at all, by an authority confined within the limits of a single State.

But if the Legislature of the Union cannot do all the good that might be wished, it is at least desirable that all may be done which is practicable. Means for promoting the introduction of foreign improvements, though less efficaciously than might be accomplished with more adequate authority, will form a part of the plan intended to be submitted in the close of this Report.

It is customary with manufacturing nations to prohibit, under severe penalties, the exportation of implements and machines, which they have either invented or improved. There are already objects for a similar regulation in the United States, and others may be expected to occur from time to time. The adoption of it seems to be dictated by the principle of reciprocity. Greater liberality in such respects might better comport with the general spirit of the country; but a selfish policy in other quarters will not always permit the free indulgence of a spirit which would place us on an unequal footing. As far as prohibitions tend to prevent foreign competitors from deriving the benefit of the improvements made at home, they tend to increase the advantages of those by whom they may have been introduced, and operate as an encouragement to exertion.

IX. Judicious regulations for the inspection of manufactured commodities.

This is not among the least important of the means by which the prosperity of manufactures may be promoted. It is indeed, in many cases, one of the most essential. Contributing to prevent frauds upon consumers at home, and exporters to foreign countries; to improve the quality and preserve the character of the national manufactures; it cannot fail to aid the expeditious and advantageous sale of them, and to serve as a guard against successful competition from other quarters. The reputation of the flour and lumber of some States, and of the potash of others, has been established by an attention to this point; and the like good name might be procured for those articles, wheresoever produced, by a judicious and uniform system of inspection throughout the ports of the United States. A like system might also be extended with advantage to other commodities.

X. The facilitating of pecuniary remittances from place to place—

Is a point of considerable moment to trade in general, and to manufactures in particular, by rendering more easy the purchase of raw materials and provisions, and the payment for manufactured supplies. A general circulation of bank paper—which is to be expected from the institution lately established—will be a most valuable mean to this end. But much good would accrue from some additional provisions respecting inland bills of exchange. If those drawn in one State, payable in another, were made negotiable everywhere, and interest and damages allowed in case of protest, it would greatly promote negotiations between the citizens of different States, by rendering them more secure, and with it the convenience and advantage of the merchants and manufacturers of each.

XI. The facilitating of the transportation of commodities.

Improvements favoring this object intimately concern all the domestic interests of a community; but they may, without impropriety, be mentioned as having an important relation to manufactures. There is, perhaps, scarcely anything which has been better calculated to assist the manufactures of Great Britain than the ameliorations of the public roads of that Kingdom, and the great progress which has been of late made in opening canals. Of the former, the United States stand much in need, for they present uncommon facilities.

The symptoms of attention to the improvement of inland navigation, which have lately appeared in some quarters, must fill with pleasure every breast warmed with a true zeal for the prosperity of the country. These examples, it is to be hoped, will stimulate the exertions of the Government and citizens of every State. There can certainly be no object more worthy of the care of the local administrations; and it were to be wished that there was no doubt of the power of the National Government to lend its direct aid, on a comprehensive plan. This is one of those improvements which could be prosecuted with more efficacy by the whole, than by any part or parts of the Union. There are cases in which the general interest will be in danger to be sacrificed to the collision of some supposed local interests. Jealousies, in matters of this kind, are as apt to exist, as they are apt to be erroneous.

The following remarks are sufficiently judicious and pertinent to deserve a literal quotation:

"Good roads, canals, and navigable rivers, by diminishing the expense of carriage, put the remote parts of a country more nearly upon a level with those in the neighborhood of the town. They are upon that account the greatest of all improvements. They encourage the cultivation of the remote, which must always be the most extensive circle of the country. They are advantages to the town, by breaking down the monopoly of the country in its neighborhood. They are advantages even to that part of the country. Though they introduce some rival commodities into the old market, they open many new markets to its produce. Monopoly, besides, is a great enemy to good management, which can never be universally established, but in consequence of that free and universal competition, which forces everybody to have recourse to it for the sake of self defence. It is not more than fifty years ago that some of the counties in the neighborhood of London petitioned the Parliament against the extension of the turnpike roads into the remoter counties. Those remoter counties, they pretended, from the cheapness of labor, would be able to sell their grass and corn cheaper in the London market, than themselves, and they would thereby reduce their rents, and ruin their cultivation. Their rents, however, have risen, and their cultivation has been improved, since that time."

Specimens of a spirit similar to that which governed the counties here spoken of, present themselves too frequently to the eye of an impartial observer, and render it a wish of patriotism that the body in this country, in whose councils a local or partial spirit is least likely to predominate, were at liberty to pursue and promote the general interest, in those instances in which there might be danger of the interference of such a spirit.

The foregoing are the principal of the means by which the growth of manufactures is ordinarily promoted. It is, however, not merely necessary that the measures of Government which have a direct view to manufactures, should be calculated to assist and protect them, but that those which only collaterally affect them, in the general course of the Administration, should be guarded from any peculiar tendency to injure them.

There are certain species of taxes which are apt to be oppressive to different parts of the community, and, among other ill effects, have a very unfriendly aspect towards manufactures. All poll or capitation taxes are of this nature. They either proceed according to a fixed rate, which operates unequally, and injuriously to the industrious poor; or they vest a discretion in certain officers, to make estimates and assessments which are necessarily vague, conjectural, and liable to abuse. They ought, therefore, to be abstained from, in all but cases of distressing emergency.

All such taxes (including all taxes on occupations) which proceed according to the amount of capital supposed to be employed in a business, or of profits supposed to be made in it, are unavoidably hurtful to industry. It is in vain that the evil may be endeavored to be mitigated, by leaving it, in the first instance, in the option of the party to be taxed, to declare the amount of his capital or profits.

Men engaged in any trade or business have commonly weighty reasons to avoid disclosures, which would expose, with anything like accuracy, the real state of their affairs. They most frequently find it better to risk oppression, than to avail themselves of so inconvenient a refuge; and the consequence is, that they often suffer oppression.

When the disclosure, too, if made, is not definitive, but controllable by the discretion, or, in other words, by the passions and prejudices of the revenue officers, it is not only an ineffectual protection, but the possibility of its being so is an additional reason for not resorting to it.

Allowing to the public officers the most equitable dispositions, yet where they are to exercise a discretion without certain data, they cannot fail to be often misled by appearances. The quantity of business which seems to be going on, is, in a vast number of cases, a very deceitful criterion of the profits which are made; yet it is, perhaps, the best they can have, and it is the one on which they will most naturally rely. A business, therefore, which may rather require aid from the Government than be in a capacity to be contributory to it, may find itself crushed by the mistaken conjectures of the assessors of taxes.

Arbitrary taxes—under which denomination are comprised all those that leave the quantum of the tax to be raised on each person to the discretion of certain officers—are as contrary to the genius of liberty, as to the maxims of industry. In this light they have been viewed by the most judicious observers on Government, who have bestowed upon them the severest epithets of reprobation, as constituting one of the worst features usually to be met with in the practice of despotic governments. It is certain, at least, that such taxes are particularly inimical to the success of manufacturing industry, and ought carefully to be avoided by a government which desires to promote it.

The great copiousness of the subject of this Report, has insensibly led to a more lengthy preliminary discussion, than was originally contemplated or intended. It appeared proper to investigate principles, to consider objections, and to endeavor to establish the utility of the thing proposed to be encouraged, previous to a specification of the objects which might occur, as meriting or requiring encouragement, and of the measures which might be proper in respect to each. The first purpose having been fulfilled, it remains to pursue the second.

In the selection of objects, five circumstances seem entitled to particular attention: The capacity of the country to furnish the raw material—the degree in which the nature of the manufacture admits of a substitute for manual labor in machinery—the facility of execution—the extensiveness of the uses to which the article can be applied—its subserviency to other interests, particularly the great one of the national defence. There are, however, objects to which these circumstances are little applicable, which, for some special reasons, may have a claim to encouragement.

A designation of the principal raw material of which each manufacture is composed, will serve to introduce the remarks upon it; as, in the first place, IRON.—The manufactures of this article are entitled to pre-eminent rank. None are more essential in their kinds, nor so extensive in their uses. They constitute, in whole or in part, the implements or the materials, or both, of almost every useful occupation. Their instrumentality is everywhere conspicuous.

It is fortunate for the United States that they have peculiar advantages for deriving the full benefit of this most valuable material, and they have every motive to improve it, with systematic care. It is to be found in various parts of the United States, in great abundance and of almost every quality; and fuel, the chief instrument in manufacturing it, is both cheap and plenty. This particularly applies to charcoal; but there are productive coal mines already in operation, and strong indications, that the material is to be found in abundance, in a variety of other places.

The inquiries to which the subject of this Report has led, have been answered with proofs that manufactures of iron, though generally understood to be extensive, are far more so than is commonly supposed. The kinds in which the greatest progress has been made, have been mentioned in another place, and need not be repeated; but there is little doubt that every other kind, with due cultivation, will rapidly succeed. It is worthy of remark, that several of the particular trades, of which it is the basis, are capable of being carried on without the aid of large capitals.

Iron works have greatly increased in the United States, and are prosecuted with much more advantage than formerly. The average price before the Revolution, was about sixty-four dollars per ton; at present it is about eighty; a rise which is chiefly to be attributed to the increase of manufactures of the material.

The still further extension and multiplication of such manufactures will have the double effect of promoting the extraction of the metal itself, and of converting it to a greater number of profitable purposes.

Those manufactures, too, unite in a greater degree, than almost any others, the several requisites, which have been mentioned, as proper to be consulted in the selection of objects.

The only further encouragement of manufactures of this article, the propriety of which may be considered as unquestionable, seems to be an

Steel is a branch which has already made a considerable progress, and it is ascertained that some new enterprises, on a more extensive scale, have been lately set on foot. The facility of carrying it to an extent which will supply all internal demands, and furnish a considerable surplus for exportation, cannot be doubted. The duty upon the importation of this article, which is at present seventy-five cents per cwt., may, it is conceived, be safely and advantageously extended to one hundred cents. It is desirable, by decisive arrangements, to second the efforts which are making in so very valuable a branch.

The United States already, in a great measure, supply themselves with nails and spikes. They are able, and ought certainly, to do it entirely. The first and most laborious operation in this manufacture, is performed by water-mills; and of the persons afterwards employed, a great proportion are boys, whose early habits of industry are of importance to the community, to the present support of their families, and to their own future comfort. It is not less curious than true, that, in certain parts of the country, the making of nails is an occasional family manufacture.

The expediency of an additional duty on these articles is indicated by an important fact. About 1,800,000 pounds of them were imported into the United States in the course of a year, ending the 30th of September, 1790. A duty of two cents per pound would, it is presumable, speedily put an end to so considerable an importation. And it is in every view proper that an aid should be put to it.

The manufacture of these articles, like that of some others, suffers from the carelessness and dishonesty of a part of those who carry it on. An inspection in certain cases might tend to correct the evil. It will deserve consideration whether a regulation of this sort cannot be applied, without inconvenience, to the exportation of the articles either to foreign countries, or from one State to another.

The implements of husbandry are made in several States in great abundance. In many places it is done by the common blacksmiths. And there is no doubt that an ample supply for the whole country can with great ease be procured among ourselves.

Various kinds of edged tools for the use of mechanics are also made, and a considerable quantity of hollow wares; though the business of castings has not yet attained the perfection which might be wished. It is however improving, and as there are respectable capitals in good hands, embarked in the prosecution of those branches of iron manufactures, which are yet in their infancy, they may all be contemplated as objects not difficult to be acquired.

To insure the end it seems equally safe and prudent to extend the duty ad valorem upon all manufactures of iron, of which iron is the article of chief value, to ten per cent.

Fire arms and other military weapons may, it is conceived, be placed without inconvenience in the class of articles rated at fifteen per cent. There exist already manufactures of these articles, which only require the stimulus of a certain demand to render them adequate to the supply of the United States.

It would also be a material aid to manufactures of this nature, as well as a mean of public security if provision should be made for an annual purchase of military weapons, of home manufacture to a certain determined extent, in order to the formation of arsenals; and to replace from time to time such as should be withdrawn for use, so as always to have in store the quantity of each kind, which should be deemed a competent supply.

But it may hereafter deserve Legislative consideration, whether manufactures of all the necessary weapons of war ought not to be established on account of Government itself. Such establishments are agreeable to the usual practice of nations, and that practice seems founded on sufficient reason.

There appears to be an improvidence, in leaving these essential instruments of national defence to the casual speculations of individual adventure; a resource which can less be relied upon, in this case than in most others; the articles in question not being objects of ordinary and indispensable private consumption or use. As a general rule, manufactures on the immediate account of Government are to be avoided; but this seems to be one of the few exceptions, which that rule admits, depending on very special reasons.

Manufactures of steel, generally, or of which steel is the article of chief value, may with advantage be placed in the class of goods rated at seven and an half per cent. As manufactures of this kind have not yet made any considerable progress, it is a reason for not rating them as high as those of iron; but as this material is the basis of them, and as their extension is not less practicable, than important, it is desirable to promote it by a somewhat higher duty than the present.

A question arises, how far it might be expedient to permit the importation of iron in pigs and bars free from duty? It would certainly be favorable to manufacturers of the article; but the doubt is whether it might not interfere with its production.

Two circumstances, however, abate if they do not remove apprehension, on this score, one is the considerable increase of price, which has been already remarked, and which renders it probable that the free admission of foreign iron would not be inconsistent with an adequate profit to the proprietors of iron works; the other is, the augmentation of demand, which would be likely to attend the increase of manufactures of the article, in consequence of the additional encouragements proposed to be given. But caution, nevertheless, in a matter of this kind is most advisable. The measure suggested ought perhaps rather to be contemplated, subject to the lights of further experience, than immediately adopted.

Copper.—The manufactures of which this article is susceptible are also of great extent and utility. Under this description, those of brass, of which it is the principal ingredient, are intended to be included.

The material is a natural production of the country. Mines of copper have actually been wrought, and with a profit to the undertakers, though it is not known, that any are now in this condition. And nothing is easier, than the introduction of it, from other countries, on moderate terms, and in great plenty.

Coppersmiths and brass founders, particularly the former, are numerous in the United States; some of whom carry on business to a respectable extent.

To multiply and extend manufactures, of the materials in question is worthy of attention and effort. In order to this, it is desirable to facilitate a plentiful supply of the materials. And a proper mean to this end is to place them in the class of free articles. Copper in plates and brass are already in this predicament; but copper in bars and pigs with copper and charcoal, constitute the component ingredients of brass. The exemption from duty by parity of reason, ought to embrace all such of these articles, as are objects of importation.

An additional duty on brass wares, will tend to the general end in view. These now stand at five per cent., while those of tin, pewter, and copper, are rated at seven and an half. There appears to be a propriety in every view in placing brass wares upon the same level with them; and it merits consideration whether the duty upon all of them ought not to be raised to ten per cent.

LEAD.—There are numerous proofs, that this material abounds in the United States, and requires little to unfold it to an extent, more than equal to every domestic occasion. A prolific mine of it has long been open in the Southwestern parts of Virginia, and under a public administration, during the late war, yielded a considerable supply for military use. This is now in the hands of individuals, who not only carry it on with spirit, but have established manufactories of it, at Richmond, in the same State.

The duties already laid upon the importation of this article, either in its unmanufactured, or manufactured state, insure it a decisive advantage in the home market—which amounts to considerable encouragement. If the duty on pewter wares should be raised, it would afford a further encouragement. Nothing else occurs proper to be added.

FOSSIL COAL.—This as an important instrument of manufactures, may, without impropriety, be mentioned among the subjects of this Report.

A copious supply of it would be of great consequence to the iron branch. As an article of household fuel, also, it is an interesting production; the utility of which must increase in proportion to the decrease of wood, by the progress of settlement and cultivation. And its importance to navigation, as an immense article of transportation coastwise, is signally exemplified in Great Britain.

It is known, that there are several coal mines in Virginia, now worked, and appearances of their existence are familiar in a number of places.

The expediency of a bounty on all this species of coal of home production, and of premiums on the opening of new mines, under certain qualifications, appears to be worthy of particular examination. The great importance of the article will amply justify a reasonable expense in this way, if it shall appear to be necessary to, and shall be thought likely to answer the end.

Wool.—Several manufactures of this article flourish in the United States. Ships are no where built in greater perfection, and cabinet wares, generally, are made little if at all inferior to those of Europe. Their extent is such as to have admitted of considerable exportation.

An exemption from duty of the several kinds of wool ordinarily used in these manufactures seems to be all that is requisite, by way of encouragement. It is recommended by the consideration of a similar policy being pursued in other countries, and by the expediency of giving equal advantages to our own workmen in wool. The abundance of timber proper for ship building in the United States does not appear to be any objection to it. The increasing scarcity and growing importation of that article in the European countries, admonish the United States to commence, and systematically to pursue measures for the preservation of their stock. Whatever may promote the regular establishment of magazines of ship timber, is in various views desirable.

SKINS.—There are scarcely any manufactories of greater importance than of this article. Their direct and very happy influence upon agriculture, by promoting the raising of cattle of different kinds, is a very material recommendation.

It is pleasing, too, to observe the extensive progress they have made in their principal branches; which are so far matured as almost to defy foreign competition. Tanneries in particular are not only carried on as a regular business in numerous instances and in various parts of the country, but they constitute in some places a valuable item of incidental family manufactures.

Representations, however, have been made importing the expediency of further encouragement to the leather branch in two ways; one by increasing the duty on the manufactures of it, which are imported, the other by prohibiting the exportation of bark. In support of the latter it is alleged that the price of bark, chiefly, in consequence of large exportations, has risen within a few years from about three dollars to four dollars and a half per cord.

These suggestions are submitted rather as intimations, which merit consideration, than as matters, the propriety of which is manifest. It is not clear, that an increase of duty is necessary; and in regard to the prohibition desired, there is no evidence of any considerable exportation hitherto; and it is most probable that whatever augmentation of price may have taken place, is to be attributed to an extension of the home demand from increase of manufactures, and to a decrease of the supply in consequence of the progress of settlement, rather than to the quantities which have been exported.

It is mentioned, however, as an additional reason for the prohibition, that one species of the bark usually exported is in some sort peculiar to the country, and the material of a very valuable dye, of great use in some other manufactures, in which the United States have begun a competition.

There may also be this argument in favor of an increase of duty. The object is of importance enough to claim decisive encouragement, and the progress which has been made, leaves no room to apprehend any inconvenience on the score of supply from such an increase.

It would be of benefit to this branch, if glue which is now rated at five per cent. were made the object of an excluding duty. It is already made in large quantities at various tanneries; and, like paper, is an entire economy of material, which, if not manufactured, would be left to perish. It may be placed with advantage in the class of articles paying fifteen per cent.

GRAIN.—Manufactures of the several species of this article have a title to peculiar favor; not only because they are most of them immediately connected with the subsistence of the citizens, but because they enlarge the demand for the most precious products of the soil.

Though flour may, with propriety, be noticed as a manufacture of grain, it were useless to do it, but for the purpose of submitting the expediency of a general system of inspection throughout the ports of the United States; which, if established upon proper principles, would be likely to improve the quality of our flour everywhere, and to raise its reputation in foreign markets. There are, however, considerations which stand in the way of such an arrangement. Ardent spirits and malt liquors are, next to flour, the two principal manufactures of grain. The first has made a very extensive, the last a considerable progress, in the United States. In respect to both, an exclusive possession of the home market ought to be secured to the domestic manufacturers as fast as circumstances will admit. Nothing is more practicable, and nothing more desirable. The existing laws of the United States have done much toward attaining this valuable object; but some additions to the present duties on foreign distilled spirits and foreign malt liquors, and perhaps an abatement of those on home-made spirits, would more effectually secure it; and there does not occur any very weighty objection to either. An augmentation of the duties on imported spirits would favor as well the distillation of spirits from molasses as that of grain. And to secure to the nation the benefit of a manufacture, even of foreign materials, is always of great, though perhaps of secondary importance. A strong impression prevails in the minds of those concerned in distilleries (including, too, the most candid and enlightened) that greater differences in the rates of duty on foreign and domestic spirits are necessary completely to secure the successful manufacture of the latter; and there are facts which entitle this impression to attention. It is known that the price of molasses, for some years past, has been successively rising in the West India markets, owing, partly, to a competition which did not formerly exist, and partly to an extension of demand in this country; and it is evident that the late disturbances in those islands from which we draw our principal supply must so far interfere with the production of the article as to occasion a material enhancement of price. The destruction in Hispaniola, in particular, must not only contribute very much to that effect, but may be expected to give it some duration. These circumstances, and the duty of three cents per gallon on molasses, may render it difficult for the distillers of that material to maintain with adequate profit, a competition with the rum brought from the West Indies, the quality of which is so considerably superior. The consumption of Geneva, or gin, in this country, is extensive. It is not long since distilleries of it have grown up among us to any importance. They are now becoming of consequence, but being still in their infancy, they require protection. It is represented that the price of some of the materials is greater here than in Holland, from which place large quantities are brought; the price of labor considerably greater; the capitals engaged in the business there much larger than those in which are employed here; the rate of profits at much less; the prejudices in favor of imported gin, strong. These circumstances are alleged to outweigh the charges which attend the bringing of the article from Europe to the United States and the present difference of duty, so as to obstruct the prosecution of the manufacture with due advantage. Experiment could, perhaps, alone decide with certainty the justness of the suggestions which are made; but, in relation to branches of manufacture so important, it would seem inexpedient to hazard an unfavorable issue, and better to err on the side of too great, than of too small a difference, in the particular in question. It is, therefore, submitted that an addition of two cents per gallon be made to the duty on imported spirits increase on those of higher proof, and that a deduction of one cent per gallon be made from the duty on spirits distilled within the United States, beginning with the first class of proof, and a proportionable deduction from the duty on those of higher proof. It is ascertained that by far the greatest part of the malt liquors consumed in the United States are the produce of domestic breweries. It is desirable, and, in all likelihood, attainable, that the whole consumption should be supplied by ourselves. The malt liquors made at home, though inferior to the best, are equal to a great part of those which have been usually imported. The progress already made is an earnest of what may be accomplished. The growing competition is an assurance of improvement. This will be accelerated by measures tending to invite a greater capital into this channel of employment. To render the encouragement of domestic breweries decisive, it may be advisable to substitute to the present rates of duty eight cents per gallon generally; and it will deserve to be considered, as a guard against invasions, whether there ought not to be a prohibition of their importation, except in casks of considerable capacity. It is to be hoped that such a duty would banish from the market foreign malt liquors of inferior quality, and that the best kind only would continue to be imported, till it should be supplanted by the efforts of equal skill or care at home. Till that period the importation so qualified would be an useful stimulus to improvement; and, in the meantime, the payment of the increased price, for the enjoyment of a luxury, in order to the encouragement of a most useful branch of domestic industry, could not reasonably be deemed a hardship. As a further aid to manufactures of grain, though upon a smaller scale, the articles of starch, hair powder, and wafers, may with great propriety be placed among those which are rated at fifteen per cent. No manufactures are more simple, nor more completely within the reach of a full supply from domestic sources; and it is a policy, as common as it is obvious, to make them the objects either of prohibitory duties or of express prohibition.

FLAX AND HEMP.—Manufactures of these articles have so much affinity to each other, and they are so often blended, that they may with advantage be considered in conjunction. The importance of the linen branch to agriculture, its precious effects upon household industry, the ease with which the materials can be produced at home to any requisite extent, the great advances which have been already made in the coarser fabrics of them, especially in the family way, constitute claims of peculiar force to the patronage of Government. This patronage may be afforded in various ways, by promoting the growth of the materials, by increasing the impediments to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles, by direct bounties or premiums upon the home manufacture. First, as to promoting the growth of the materials. In respect to hemp, something has been already done by the high duty upon foreign hemp. If the facilities for domestic production were not unusually great, the policy of the duty on the foreign raw material would be highly questionable, as interfering with the growth of manufactures of it. But, making the proper allowances for those facilities, and with an eye to the future and natural progress of the country, the measure does not appear, upon the whole, exceptionable. A strong wish naturally suggests itself that some method could be devised of affording a more direct encouragement to the growth both of flax and hemp, such as would be effectual, and at the same time not attended with too great inconveniences. To this end bounties and premiums offer themselves to consideration; but no modification of them has yet occurred which would not either hazard too much expense or operate unequally in reference to the circumstances of different parts of the Union, and which would not be attended with very great difficulties in the execution. Secondly, as to increasing the impediments to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles. To this purpose an augmentation of the duties on importation is the obvious expedient; which, in regard to certain articles, appears to be recommended by sufficient reasons. The principal of these articles is sail cloth, one intimately connected with navigation and defence, and of which a flourishing manufactory is established at Boston, and very promising ones at several other places. It is presumed to be both safe and advisable to place this in the class of articles rated at ten per cent. A strong reason for it results from the consideration that a bounty of two pence sterling per ell is allowed in Great Britain upon the exportation of the sail cloth manufactured in that Kingdom. It would likewise appear to be good policy to raise the duty to seven and a half per cent. on the following articles: drillings, osenaburges, ticklenburgs, dowlas, canvas, brown rolls, bagging, and upon all other linens the first cost of which at the place of exportation does not exceed thirty-five cents per yard. A bounty of twelve and a half per cent., upon an average, on the exportation of such or similar linens from Great Britain encourages the manufacture of them in that country, and increases the obstacles to a successful competition in the countries to which they are sent. The quantities of tow and other household linens manufactured in different parts of the United States, and the expectations which are derived from some late experiments of being able to extend the use of labor-saving machines in the coarser fabrics of linen, obviate the danger of inconvenience from an increase of the duty upon such articles, and authorize a hope of speedy and complete success to the endeavors which may be used for procuring an internal supply. Thirdly, as to direct bounties or premiums upon the manufactured articles. To afford more effectual encouragement to the manufacture, and at the same time to promote the cheapness of the article, for the benefit of navigation, it will be of great use to allow a bounty of two cents per yard on all sail cloth which is made in the United States from materials of their own growth. This would also assist the culture of those materials. An encouragement of this kind, if adopted, ought to be established for a moderate term of years, to invite to new undertakings, and to an extension of the old. This is an article of importance enough to warrant the employment of extraordinary means in its favor.

COTTON.—There is something in the texture of this material which adapts it, in a peculiar degree, to the application of machines. The signal utility of the mill for spinning of cotton, not long since invented in England, has been noticed in another place; but there are other machines scarcely inferior in utility, which, in the different manufactures of this article, are employed either exclusively or with more than ordinary effect. This very important circumstance recommends the fabric of cotton, in a more particular manner, to a country in which a defect of hands constitutes the greatest obstacle to success. The variety and extent of the uses to which the manufactures of this article are applicable is another powerful argument in their favor. And the faculty of the United States to produce the raw material in abundance, and of a quality which, though alleged to be inferior to some that is produced in other quarters, is, nevertheless, capable of being used with advantage in many fabrics, and is probably susceptible of being carried, by a more experienced culture, to much greater perfection, suggests an additional and a very cogent inducement to the vigorous pursuit of the cotton branch in its several subdivisions. How much has been already done has been stated in a preceding part of this Report. In addition to this, it may be announced that a society is forming with a capital which is expected to be extended to at least half a million of dollars; on behalf of which measures are already in train for prosecuting, on a large scale, the making and printing of cotton goods. These circumstances conspire to indicate the expediency of removing any obstructions which may happen to exist to the advantageous prosecution of the manufactures in question, and of adding such encouragements as may appear necessary and proper. The present duty of three cents per pound on the foreign raw material is undoubtedly a very serious impediment to the progress of those manufactures. The injurious tendency of similar duties, either prior to the establishment, or in the infancy of the domestic manufacture of the article, as it regards the manufacture, and their worse than inutilty, in relation to the home production of the material itself, have been anticipated, particularly in discussing the subject of pecuniary bounties. Cotton has not the same pretensions with hemp to form an exception to the general rule. Not being, like hemp, an universal production of the country, it affords less assurance of an adequate internal supply; but the chief object arises from the doubts which are entertained concerning the quality of the national cotton. It is alleged that the fibre of it is considerably shorter and weaker than that of some other places; and it has been observed, as a general rule, that the nearer the place of growth to the Equator, the better the quality of the cotton. That which comes from Cayenne, Surinam, and Demerara, is said to be preferable, even at a material difference of price, to the cotton of the islands.

While a hope may reasonably be indulged, that with due care and attention, the national cotton may be made to approach nearer than it now does to that of regions somewhat more favored by climate; and, while facts authorize an opinion that very great use may be made of it, and that it is a resource which gives greater security to the cotton fabrics of this country than can be enjoyed by any which depend wholly on external supply, it will certainly be wise, in every view, to let our infant manufactures have the full benefit of the best materials on the cheapest terms. It is obvious that the necessity of having such materials is proportioned to the unskilfulness and inexperience of the workmen employed, who, if inexperienced, will not fail to commit great waste where the materials they are to work with are of an indifferent kind. To secure to the national manufacturers so essential an advantage, a repeal of the present duty on imported cotton is indispensable. A substitute for this, far more encouraging to domestic production, will also grant a bounty on the national cotton, when wrought at a home manufactory; to which a bounty on the exportation of it may be added; but either or both would do much more towards promoting the growth of the article than the merely nominal encouragement which it is proposed to abolish. The first would also have a direct influence in encouraging the manufacturer. The bounty which has been mentioned as existing in Great Britain upon the exportation of coarse linens not exceeding a certain value, applies also to certain descriptions of cotton goods of similar value. This furnishes an additional argument for allowing to the national manufacturers the species of encouragement just suggested, and, indeed, for adding some other aid. One cent per yard, not less than of a given width, on all goods of cotton, or of cotton and linen mixed, which are manufactured in the United States, with the addition of one cent per pound weight of the material, if made of national cotton, would amount to an aid of considerable importance both to the production and to the manufacture of that valuable article. And it is conceived that the expense would be well justified by the magnitude of the object. The printing and staining of cotton goods is known to be a distinct business from the fabrication of them. It is one easily accomplished, and which, as it adds materially to the value of a variety of new uses, is of importance to be promoted. As imported cottons, equally with those which are made at home, may be the objects of this manufacture, it will merit consideration whether the whole or a part of the duty on the white goods ought not to be allowed to be drawn back in favor of those who print or stain them. This measure would certainly operate as a powerful encouragement to the business; and, though it may in a degree counteract the original fabrication of the articles, it would probably more than compensate for this disadvantage in the rapid growth of a collateral branch, which is of a nature sooner to attain to maturity. When a sufficient progress shall have been made, the drawback may be abrogated, and by that time the domestic supply of the articles to be printed or stained will have been extended. If the duty of seven and a half per cent. on certain kinds of cotton goods were extended to all goods of cotton, or of which it is the principal material, it would probably more than counterbalance the effect of the drawback proposed in relation to the fabrication of the article. And no material objection occurs to such an extension. The duty, then, considering all the circumstances which attend goods of this description, could not be deemed inconveniently high; and it may be inferred, from various causes, that the prices of them would still continue moderate. Manufactories of cotton goods not long since established at Beverly, in Massachusetts, and at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, and conducted with a perseverance corresponding with the patriotic motives which began them, seem to have overcome the first obstacles to success, producing corduroys, velvets, fustians, jeans, and other similar articles, of a quality which will bear a comparison with the like articles brought from Manchester. The one at Providence has the merit of being the first in introducing into the United States the celebrated cotton mill, which not only furnishes materials for that manufactory itself, but for the supply of private families for household manufacture. Other manufactories of the same material, as regular businesses, have also been begun at different places in the State of Connecticut, but all upon a smaller scale than those above mentioned. Some essays are also making in the printing and staining of cotton goods. There are several small establishments of this kind already on foot.

Wool.—In a country the climate of which partakes of so considerable a proportion of Winter as that of a great part of the United States, the woollen branch cannot be regarded as inferior to any which relates to the clothing of the inhabitants. Household manufactures of this material are carried on, in different parts of the United States, to a very interesting extent; but there is only one branch which, as a regular business, can be said to have acquired maturity; this is the making of hats. Hats of wool, and of wool mixed with fur, are made in large quantities in different States; and nothing seems wanting but an adequate supply of materials to render the manufacture commensurate with the demand. A promising essay towards the fabrication of cloths, cassimeres, and other woollen goods, is likewise going on at Hartford, in Connecticut. Specimens of the different kinds which are made, in the possession of the Secretary, evince that these fabrics have attained a very considerable degree of perfection. Their quality certainly surpasses any thing that could have been looked for in so short a time and under so great disadvantages, and compares, with the scantiness of the means which have been at the command of the directors, to form the eulogium of that public spirit, perseverance, and judgment, which have been able to accomplish so much. To cherish and bring to maturity this precious embryo must engage the most ardent wishes, and proportionable regret, as far as the means of doing it may appear difficult or uncertain. Measures which should tend to promote an abundant supply of wool, of good quality, would probably afford the most efficacious aid that present circumstances permit. To encourage the raising and improving the breed of sheep at home would certainly be the most desirable expedient for that purpose; but it may not be alone sufficient, especially as it is yet a problem whether our wool be capable of such a degree of improvement as to render it fit for the finer fabrics. Premiums would probably be found the best means of promoting the domestic, and bounties the foreign supply; the first may be within the compass of the institution hereafter to be submitted; the last would require a specific Legislative provision. If any bounties are granted, they ought, of course, to be adjusted with an eye to quality as well as quantity. A fund for this purpose may be derived from the addition of two and a half per cent. to the present rate of duty on carpets and carpeting, an increase to which the nature of the articles suggests no objection, and which may at the same time furnish a motive the more to the fabrication of them at home, toward which some beginnings have been made.

Stux.—The production of this article is attended with great facility in most parts of the United States. Some pleasing essays are making in Connecticut, as well toward that as toward the manufacture of what is produced. Stockings, handkerchiefs, ribbons and buttons, are made, though as yet but in small quantities.

A manufactory of lace, upon a scale not very extensive, has been long memorable at Ipswich, in the State of Massachusetts. An exemption of the material from the duty which it now pays on importation, and premiums upon the production to be dispensed under the direction of the institution before alluded to, seem to be the only species of encouragement advisable at so early a stage of the thing.

Glass.—The materials for making glass are found everywhere. In the United States there is no deficiency of them. The sands and stones called Tasso, which includes flinty and crystalline substances generally, and the salts of various plants, particularly of the sea-weed kali or kelp, constitute the essential ingredients. An extraordinary abundance of fuel is a particular advantage enjoyed by this country for such manufactures. They, however, require large capitals and involve much manual labor.

Different manufactories of glass are now on foot in the United States. The present duty of twelve and a half per cent. on all imported articles of glass amount to a considerable encouragement to those manufactories. If anything in addition is judged eligible, the most proper would appear to be a direct bounty on window glass, and black bottles. The first recommends itself as an object of general convenience; the last adds to that character, the circumstance of being an important item in breweries. A complaint is made of great deficiency in this respect.

Gunpowder.—No small progress has been of late made in the manufacture of this very important article. It may, indeed, be considered as already established; but its high importance renders its further extension very desirable. The encouragements which it already enjoys, are a duty of ten per cent. on the foreign rival article, and an exemption of salt-petre, one of the principal ingredients of which it is composed, from duty. A like exemption of sulphur, another chief ingredient, would appear to be equally proper. No quantity of this article has yet been produced, from internal sources. The use made of it in finishing the bottoms of ships, is an additional inducement to placing it in the class of free goods. Regulations for the careful inspection of the article would have a favorable tendency.

Paper.—Manufactories of paper are among those which are arrived at the greatest maturity in the United States, and are most adequate to national supply. That of paper-hangings is a branch in which respectable progress has been made. Nothing material seems wanting to the further success of this valuable branch, which is already protected by a competent duty on similar imported articles.

In the enumeration of the several kinds, made subject to that duty, sheeting and cartridge paper have been omitted. These being the most simple manufactures of the sort, and necessary to military supply, as well as ship-building, recommend themselves equally with those of other descriptions to encouragement, and appear to be as fully within the compass of domestic exertions.

PRINTED BOOKS.—The great number of presses disseminated throughout the Union, seem to afford an assurance that there is no need of being indebted to foreign countries for the printing of the books which are used in the United States. A duty of ten per cent. instead of five, which is now charged upon the article, would have a tendency to aid the business internally.

It occurs as an objection to this, that it may have an unfavorable aspect toward literature, by raising the prices of books in universal use in private families, schools, and other seminaries of learning. But the difference, it is conceived, would be without effect. As to books, which usually fill the libraries of the wealthier classes and of professional men, such an augmentation of prices, as might be occasioned by an additional duty of five per cent. would be too little felt to be an impediment to the acquisition.

And with regard to books which may be especially imported for the use of particular Seminaries of Learning, and of Public Libraries, a total exemption from duty would be advisable, which would go far toward obviating the objection just mentioned. They are now subject to a duty of five per cent. As to the books in most general family use, the constancy and universality of the demand would insure exertions to furnish them at home, and the means are completely adequate. It may also be expected ultimately, in this as in other cases, that the extension of the domestic manufacture would conduce to the cheapness of the article. It ought not to pass unremarked, that to encourage the printing of books is to encourage the manufacture of paper.

REFINED SUGARS AND CHOCOLATE.—Are among the number of extensive and prosperous domestic manufactures. Drawbacks of the duties upon the materials of which they are respectively made, in cases of exportation, would have a beneficial influence upon the manufacture, and would conform to a precedent which has been already furnished in the instance of molasses on the exportation of distilled spirits.

Cocoa, the raw material, now pays a duty of one cent per lb., while chocolate, which is a prevailing and very simple manufacture, is comprised in the mass of articles rated at no more than five per cent. There would appear to be a propriety in encouraging the manufacture by a somewhat higher duty on its foreign rival than is paid on the raw material. Two cents per lb. on imported chocolate would, it is presumed, be without inconvenience.

The foregoing heads comprise the most important of the several kinds of manufactures, which have occurred as requiring; and, at the same time, as most proper for public encouragement; and such measures for affording it as have appeared best calculated to answer the end, have been suggested. The observations which have accompanied this delineation of objects, supersede the necessity of many supplementary remarks. One or two, however, may not be altogether superfluous.

Bounties are in various instances proposed as one species of encouragement. It is a similar objection to them that they are difficult to be managed and liable to frauds. But neither that difficulty nor this danger seems sufficiently great to countervail the advantages of which they are productive, when rightly applied. And it is presumed to have been shown that they are in some cases, particularly in the infancy of new enterprises, indispensable.

It will, however, be necessary to guard with extraordinary circumspection the manner of dispensing them. The requisite precautions have been thought of; but to enter into the detail would swell this Report, already voluminous, to a size too inconvenient. If the principle shall not be deemed inadmissible, the means of avoiding an abuse of it will not be likely to present insurmountable obstacles. There are useful guides from practice in other quarters. It shall, therefore, only be remarked here, in relation to this point, that the bounty which may be applied to the manufacture of an article, cannot with safety extend beyond those manufactures at which the making of the article is a regular trade. It would be impossible to annex adequate precautions to a benefit of that nature, if extended to every private family in which the manufacture was incidentally carried on, and its being a merely incidental occupation, which engages a portion of time that would otherwise be lost, it can be advantageously carried on without so special an aid.

The possibility of diminution of the revenue may also present itself as an object of the arrangements which have been submitted. But there is no truth which may be more firmly relied upon than that the interests of the revenue are promoted by whatever promotes an increase of national industry and wealth. In proportion to the degree of these, is the capacity of every country to contribute to the public treasury; and where the capacity to pay is increased, or even is not decreased, the only consequence of measures which diminish any particular resource, is a change of the object. If, by encouraging the manufacture of an article at home, the revenue which has been wont to accrue from its importation should be lessened, an indemnification can easily be found, either out of the manufacture itself, or from some other object which may be deemed more convenient. The measures, however, which have been submitted, taken aggregately, will, for a long time to come, rather augment than decrease the public revenue.

There is little room to hope that the progress of manufactures will so equally keep pace with the progress of population, as to prevent even a gradual augmentation of the product of the duties on imported articles. As, nevertheless, an abolition in some instances, and a reduction in others of duties which have been pledged for the Public Debt is proposed, it is essential that it should be accompanied with a competent substitute. In order to this, it is requisite that all the additional duties which shall be laid, be appropriated in the first instance, to replace all defalcations which may proceed from any such abolition or diminution. It is evident, at first glance, that they will not only be adequate to this, but will yield a considerable surplus. This surplus will serve,

1st. To constitute a fund for paying the bounties which shall have been decreed.

2d. To constitute a fund for the operations of a Board to be established, for promoting arts, agriculture, manufactures and commerce. Of this institution, different intimations have been given in the course of this Report. An outline of a plan for it shall now be submitted.

Let a certain annual sum be set apart, and placed under the management of Commissioners, not less than three, to consist of certain officers in the Government and their successors in office. Let these Commissioners be empowered to apply the fund confided to them to defray the expenses of the emigration of artists and manufacturers in particular branches of extraordinary importance, to induce the prosecution and introduction of useful discoveries, inventions and improvements, by proportionate rewards, judiciously held out and applied, to encourage by premiums, both honorable and lucrative, the exertions of individuals, and of classes, in relation to the several objects they are charged with promoting, and to afford such other aids to those objects, as may be generally designated by law. The Commissioners to render to the Legislature an annual account of their transactions and disbursements; and all such sums as shall not have been applied to the purposes of their trust, at the end of every three years, to revert to the Treasury. It may also be enjoined upon them not to draw out the money, but for the purpose of some specific disbursement. It may moreover be of use, to authorize them to receive voluntary contributions; making it their duty to apply them to the particular objects for which they may have been made, if any shall have been designated by the donors.

There is reason to believe that the progress of particular manufactures has been much retarded by the want of skilful workmen. And it often happens that the capitals employed are not equal to the purposes of bringing from abroad workmen of a superior kind. Here, in cases worthy of it, the auxiliary agency of Government would in all probability be useful. There are also valuable workmen in every branch, who are prevented from emigrating by the want of means. Occasional aids to such persons, properly administered, might be a source of valuable acquisitions to the country. The propriety of stimulating by rewards the invention and introduction of useful improvements, is admitted without difficulty. But the success of attempts in this way must evidently depend much on the manner of conducting them.

It is probable, that the placing of the dispensation of those rewards under some proper discretionary direction, where they may be accompanied by collateral expedients, will serve to give them the surest efficacy. It seems impracticable to appropriate by general rules, specific compensations for discoveries of unknown and disproportionate utility. The great use which may be made of a fund of this nature to procure and import foreign improvements is particularly obvious. Among these, the article of machines would form a most important item.

The operation and utility of premiums have been adverted to, together with the advantages which have resulted from their dispensation, under the direction of certain public and private societies. Of this, some experience has been had in the instance of the Pennsylvania Society for the Promotion of Manufactures and Useful Arts; but the funds of that association have been too contracted to produce more than a very small portion of the good to which the principles of it would have led. It may confidently be affirmed that there is scarcely anything which has been devised, better calculated to excite a general spirit of improvement than the institutions of this nature. They are truly invaluable.

In countries where there is great private wealth, much may be effected by the voluntary contributions of patriotic individuals; but in a community situated like that of the United States, the public purse must supply the deficiency of private resource. In what can it be so useful, as in promoting and improving the efforts of industry?

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred by the President of the United States the resolution of Congress requesting the President "to cause an estimate to be laid before Congress, at their next session, of the quantity and situation of the lands not claimed by the Indians, nor granted to nor claimed by any citizens of the United States, within the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina, and within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio," makes thereon the following Report:

The Territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, by deed bearing date the 25th day of February, 1790, is bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning in the boundary between Virginia and North Carolina, that is to say, in the parallel of latitude 36 degrees 30 minutes north from the Equator, on the extreme height of the Stone Mountain, where the said boundary or parallel intersects it, and running thence, along the said extreme height, to the place where Watauga river breaks through it; thence, a direct course to the top of the Yellow Mountain, where Bright's road crosses the same; thence, along the ridge of the said mountain, between the waters of Doe river and the waters of Rock creek, to the place where the road crosses the Iron Mountain; from thence, along the extreme height of said mountain, to where Nolichucky river runs through the same; thence to the top of the Bald Mountain; thence, along the extreme height of the said mountain, to the Painted Rock, or French Broad river; thence, along the highest ridge of the said mountain, to the place where it is called the Great Iron or Smoky Mountain; thence, along the extreme height of the said mountain, to the place where it is called the Unaka Mountain, between the Indian towns of Cowee and Old Chote; thence, along the main ridge of the said mountain, to the southern boundary of the said State of North Carolina, that is to say, to the parallel of latitude 35 degrees north from the Equator; thence, westwardly, along the said boundary or parallel, to the middle of the river Mississippi; thence, up the middle of said river, to where it is intersected by the first mentioned parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes; thence, along the said parallel, to the beginning; which tract of country is a degree and a half of latitude from north to south, and about three hundred and sixty miles, in general, from east to west, as nearly as may be estimated from such maps as exist of that country.

The Indians having claims within the said tract of country are the Cherokees and Chickasaws, whose boundaries are settled by the Treaties of Hopewell, concluded with the Cherokees on the 28th day of November, 1785, and with the Chickasaws on the 10th day of January, 1786, and by the Treaty of Holston, concluded with the Cherokees, July 2, 1791. These treaties acknowledge to the said Indians all the lands westward and southward of the following lines, to wit: Beginning in the boundary between South and North Carolina, where the South Carolina Indian boundary strikes the same; thence, north, to a point from which a line is to be extended to the river Clinch, that shall pass the Holston, at the ridge which divides the waters running into Little river from those running into the Tennessee; thence, up the river Clinch, to Campbell's line, and, along the same, to the top of the Cumberland Mountain; thence, in a direct course, toward the Cumberland river, where the Kentucky road crosses it, as far as the Virginia line, or parallel, of 36 degrees and 30 minutes; thence, westwardly, or eastwardly, as the case shall be, along the said line or parallel, to the point thereof, which is due northeast from another point to be taken on the dividing ridge of Cumberland and Duck rivers, forty miles from Nashville; thence southward, to the point last mentioned, on the said dividing ridge, and along the said dividing ridge northwardly, to where it is intersected by the said Virginia line or parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes. So that there remained to the United States the right of pre-emption of the lands westward and southward of the said line, and the absolute right to those northward thereof, that is to say, to one parcel to the eastward, somewhat triangular, comprehending the counties of Sullivan and Washington, and parts of those of Greene and Hawkins, running about one hundred and fifty miles from east to west, on the Virginia boundary as its base, and between eighty and ninety miles from north to south where broadest, and containing, as may be conjectured, without pretending to accuracy, between seven and eight thousand square miles, or about five millions of acres: And to one other parcel, to the westward, somewhat triangular also, comprehending parts of the counties of Sumner, Davidson, and Tennessee, the base whereof extends about one hundred and fifty miles also, from east to west, on the same Virginia line, and its height from north to south about fifty-five miles, and so may comprehend about four thousand square miles, or upwards of two and a half millions of acres of land.

Within these triangles, however, are the following claims of citizens, reserved by the deed of cession, and consequently forming exceptions to the rights of the United States:

I. Appropriations by the State of North Carolina for their Continental and State officers and soldiers.

II. Grants and titles to grants vested in individuals by the laws of the State.

III. Entries made in Armstrong's office, under an act of that State, of 1783, for the redemption of specie and other certificates.

The claims covered by the first reservation are—

1st. The bounties in land given by the said State of North Carolina to their Continental line, in addition to those given by Congress. These were to be located within a district bounded northwardly by the Virginia line, and southwardly by a line parallel thereto, and fifty-five miles distant; westwardly by the Tennessee; and eastwardly by the meridian of the intersection of the Virginia line and Cumberland river. Grants have accordingly issued for 1,239,498 acres, and warrants for the further quantity of 1,549,726 acres, making, together, 2,789,224 acres.

It is to be noted that the southwestern and southeastern angles of this district, constituting perhaps a fourth or fifth of the whole, are south of the lines established by the treaties of Hopewell and Holston, and consequently in a country wherein the Indian title is acknowledged and guaranteed by the United States. No information is received of the exact proportion of the locations made within these angles.

2d. Bounties in land to Evans's battalion, raised for State purposes. These were to be taken west of Cumberland Mountain. The locations are not yet made.

The second reservation covers the following claims:

1. Lands for the Surveyor General's fees for laying out the military bounties, to be located in the military district. The grants already issued on this account amount to 30,203 acres.

2. Grants to Isaac Shelby, Anthony Bledsoe, and Absalom Tatum, Commissioners for laying out the military bounties; and to guards, chain-carriers, markers, and hunters, who attended them

3. Entries in Washington county, amounting to 746,362½ acres; for 214,541½ of which, grants have already issued. Of the remaining 531,821½ acres, a considerable proportion were declared void by the laws of the State, and were particularly excluded from the cover of the reservation in the deed of cession by this clause in it, to wit: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the making good any entry or entries, or any grant or grants, heretofore declared void by any act or acts of the General Assembly of this State." Still it is to be considered that many of these persons have settled and improved the lands, are willing, as is said, to comply with such conditions as shall be required of other purchasers, form a strong barrier on the new frontier acquired by the treaty of Holston, and are, therefore, objects meriting the consideration of the Legislature.

4. Entries in Sullivan county, amounting to 240,624 acres; for 173,332 acres of which grants have already issued. Of the remaining entries, many are certified void, and others understood to be lapsed, or otherwise voidable under the laws of the State.

5. Certain pre-emption rights, granted to the first settlers of Davidson county, on Cumberland river, amounting to 309,760 acres.

6. A grant of 200,000 acres to Richard Henderson and others, on Powell's river in a breadth of not less than four miles, and down Clinch's from their junction in a breadth not less than twelve miles. A great part of this is within the Indian territory.

Among the grants of the State now under recapitulation, as forming exceptions out of the absolute rights of the United States, are not to be reckoned here two grants of 2,000 each to Alexander Martin and David Wilson, adjacent to the lands allotted to the officers and soldiers; nor a grant of 25,000 acres on Duck river to the late Major General Greene; because they are wholly within the Indian territory, as acknowledged by the treaties of Hopewell and Holston.

The extent of the third reservation in favor of entries made in Armstrong's office is not yet entirely known, nor can be until the 20th of December, 1792, the last day given for perfecting them. The sum of certificates, however, which had been paid for these warrants into the Treasury of the State, before the 20th day of May, 1790, reaches, in all probability, near to their whole amount. This was £373,649 6s. 5d. currency of that State, and, at the price of £10 the hundred acres, established by law, shows that warrants had issued for 3,736,493 acres. For 1,762,660 acres of these, grants have passed, which appear to have been located partly in the counties of Greene and Hawkins, and partly in the country from thence to the Mississippi, as divided into Eastern, Middle, and Western Districts. Almost the whole of these locations are within the Indian territory. Besides the warrants paid for as before mentioned, it is known that there are some others outstanding and not paid for; but, perhaps, these need not be taken into account, as payment of them has been disputed, on the ground that the lands being within the Indian territory, cannot now be delivered to the holders of the warrants.

On a review of all the reservations, after making such conjectural allowance as our information authorizes, for the proportion of them, which may be within the Indian boundaries, it appears probable they cover all the ceded lands susceptible of culture and cleared of the Indian title, that is to say, all the habitable parts of the two triangles before mentioned, excepting only the lands south of French Broad and Big Pigeon rivers. These were part of the tract appropriated by the laws of the State to the use of the Indians, whose title being purchased at the late treaty of Holston, they are now free to be disposed of by the United States, and are probably the only lands open to their disposal within this Southwestern Territory which can excite the attention of purchasers. They are supposed to amount to about 300,000 acres, and we are told that three hundred families have already set down upon them without right or license.

The territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio is bounded on the south by that river, on the east by Pennsylvania, on the north and west by the lines which divide the United States from the dominions of Great Britain and Spain.

The part of this territory occupied by Indians is north and west of the following lines, established with the Wyandots, Delawares, Chippewas, and Ottawas, by the treaty of Fort McIntosh, and with the Shawanese, by that of the Great Miami, to wit: beginning at the mouth of the Cuyahoga, and running up the river to the portage between that and the Tuscaroras branch of the Muskingum; then down the said branch to the forks at the crossing place above Fort Lawrence; then westwardly, towards the portage of the Big Miami, to the main branch of that river; then down the Miami to the fork of that river next below the Old Fort which was taken by the French in 1752; thence due west to the river De la Panse, and down that river to the Wabash. So far, the lines are precisely defined, and the whole country southward of these lines and eastward of the Wabash cleared of the claims of those Indians, as it is also of those of the Pottawatomies and Sacs by the treaty of Muskingum. How far on the other side of the Wabash the southern boundary of the Indians has been defined we know not. It is only understood, in general, that their title to the lower country, between that river and the Illinois, has been formerly extinguished by the French while in their possession. As to that country, then, and what lies still beyond the Illinois, it would seem expedient that nothing be done until a fair ascertainment of boundary can take place by mutual consent between us and the Indians interested.

The country within the Wabash, the Indian line before described, the Pennsylvania line, and the Ohio, contains, on a loose estimate, about 55,000 square miles, or 35,000,000 of acres.

During the British government, great numbers of persons had formed themselves under different names, such as the Wabash, the Illinois, the Mississippi, or Vandallia Companies, and had covered with their applications a great part of this territory. Some of them had obtained orders, on certain conditions, which, having never been fulfilled, their titles were never completed by grants; others were only in a state of negotiation when the British authority was discontinued. Some of these claims being already under a special reference, by order of Congress, and all of them probably falling under the operation of the same principles, they will not be noticed in the present Report.

The claims of citizens to be here stated will be—

I. Those reserved to the States by their deeds of cession.

II. Those which have arisen under the Government of the United States themselves.

Under the first head presents itself the tract of country from the completion of the 41st degree to 42 degrees 2 minutes of north latitude, and extending from the Pennsylvania line before mentioned one hundred and twenty miles westward, not mentioned in the deed of Connecticut, while all the country westward thereof was mentioned to be ceded. About two and a half millions of acres of this may, perhaps, be without the Indian lines before mentioned.

1. A reservation in the deed of Virginia of the possessions and titles of the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers of the Kastaskias, St. Vincennes, and the neighboring villages, who had professed themselves citizens of Virginia, which rights have been settled by an act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act for granting lands to the inhabitants and settlers at Vincennes and the Illinois country, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for confirming them in their possessions." These lands are in the neighborhood of the several villages.

2. A reservation in the same deed of a quantity, not exceeding 150,000 acres of land, for General George Rogers Clark, and the officers and soldiers of his regiment, who were at the reduction of Kastaskias and St. Vincennes, to be laid off in such place, on the northwest side of the Ohio, as a majority of the officers should choose. They chose they should be laid off on the river adjacent to the rapids, which accordingly has been done.

3. A reservation in the same deed, of lands between the Scioto and Little Miami, to make up to the Virginia troops on Continental establishment the quantity which the good lands in their southern allotment might fall short of the bounties given them by the laws of that State. By a statement of the 16th September, 1788, it appears that 724,045½ acres had been surveyed for them on the southeastern side of the Ohio; that 1,395,385½ acres had been surveyed on the northwestern side; that warrants for 649,649 acres more, to be laid off on the same side of the river, were in the hands of the Surveyor, and it was supposed there might still be some few warrants not yet presented; so that this reservation may be stated at 2,045,034½ acres, or perhaps some small matter more.

III. The claims of individual citizens, derived from the United States themselves, are the following:

1. Those of the Continental Army, founded on the resolutions of Congress of September 16, 1776, August 12, and September 30, 1780, and fixed by the ordinance of May 20, 1783. The resolution of October 22, 1787, and the supplementary ordinance of July 9, 1788, in the seven ranges of townships, beginning at a point on the Ohio, due north from the western termination of a line then lately run, as the southern boundary of Pennsylvania; or, in a second tract of 1,000,000 of acres, bounded east by the seventh range of the said townships, south by the lands of Cutler and Sargent, north by an extension of the northern boundary of the said townships, and going towards the west so far as to include the above quantity; or, lastly, in a third tract of country, beginning at the mouth of the Ohio, and running up the river Mississippi to the river Au Vause; thence up the same till it meets a west line from the mouth of the Little Wabash; thence along that line to the Great Wabash; thence down the same and the Ohio to the beginning. The sum total of the said military claims is 1,851,800 acres.

2. Those of the individuals who made purchases of land at New York, within the said seven ranges of townships, according to the resolutions of Congress of April 21, 1787, and the supplementary ordinance of July 9, 1788; which claims amount to 150,896 acres.

3. The purchase of one million and a half acres of land by Cutler and Sargent, on behalf of certain individuals associated under the name of the Ohio Company. This begins where the Ohio is intersected by the western boundary of the seventh range of townships, and runs due north on that boundary 1,306 chains and 25 links; thence, due west, to the western boundary of the seventeenth range of townships; thence, due south, to the Ohio, and up that river to the beginning; the whole area containing 1,781,760 acres of land, whereof 281,760 acres, consisting of various lots and townships, are reserved to the United States.

4. The purchase by the same Cutler and Sargent, on behalf also of themselves and others. This begins at the northeastern angle of the tract of their purchase before described, and runs due north to the northern boundary of the tenth township from the Ohio; thence, due west, to the Scioto; thence, down the same, and up the Ohio, to the southwestern angle of the said purchase before described, and along the western and northern boundaries thereof to the beginning; the whole area containing 4,901,480 acres of land; out of which, however, five lots, to wit: Nos. 8, 11, 16, 26, and 29, of every township of six miles square, are retained by the United States, and out of the whole are retained the three townships of Gnadenhuetten, Schoenbrun, and Salem; and certain lands around them, as will be hereafter mentioned.

5. The purchase of John Cleves Symmes, bounded on the west by the Great Miami; on the south by the Ohio; on the east by a line which is to begin on the bank of the Ohio, twenty miles from the mouth of the Great Miami, as measured along the several courses of the Ohio, and to run parallel with the general course of the said Great Miami; and on the north by an east and west line so run as to include 1,000,000 of acres in the whole area, whereof five lots, numbered as before mentioned, are reserved out of every township by the United States.

It is suggested that this purchaser, under color of a first and larger proposition to the Board of Treasury, which was never closed, (but, pending that proposition,) sold sundry parcels of land between his eastern boundary, before mentioned, and the Little Miami, and that the purchasers have settled thereon. If these suggestions prove true, the settlers will perhaps be thought to merit the favor of the Legislature, as purchasers for valuable consideration, and without notice of the defect of title.

The contracts for lands, which were at one time under consideration with Messrs. Flint and Parker, and with Colonel Morgan, were never so far prosecuted as to bring either party under any obligation. All proceedings thereon were discontinued at a very early stage, and it is supposed that no further views exist with any other party. These, therefore, are not to be enumerated among existing claims.

6. Three townships were reserved by the ordinance of May 20, 1785, adjacent to Lake Erie, for refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes, according to resolutions of Congress, made or to be made on that subject. These would, of course, contain 69,120 acres.

7. The same ordinance of May 20, 1785, appropriated the three towns of Gnadenhuetten, Schoenbrun, and Salem, on the Muskingum, for the Christian Indians formerly settled there, or the remains of that Society, with the grounds round about them; and the quantity of the said circumjacent grounds, for each of the said towns, was determined by the resolution of Congress, of September 3, 1788, to be so much as, with the plat of its respective town, would make up 4,000 acres; so that three towns and their circumjacent lands were to amount to 12,000 acres. This reservation was accordingly made out of the large purchase of Cutler and Sargent, which comprehended them. The Indians, however, for whom the reservation was made, have chosen to emigrate beyond the limits of the United States, so that the lands reserved for them still remain to the United States.

On the whole, it appears that the United States may rightfully dispose of all the lands between the Wabash and the Ohio, Pennsylvania, the forty-first parallel of latitude, and the Indian lines described in the treaties of the Great Miami, and Fort McIntosh, with exceptions only of the rights saved by the deed of cession of Virginia, and of all rights legally derived from the Government of the United States; and, supposing the part south of the Indian lines to contain, as before conjectured, about 35,000,000 of acres, and that the claims of citizens before enumerated may amount to between 13,000,000 and 14,000,000, there remains at the disposal of the United States upwards of 21,000,000 of acres in this northwestern quarter.

And though the want of actual surveys of some parts, and of a general delineation of the whole on paper, so as to exhibit to the eye the locations, forms, and relative positions of the rights before described, may prevent our forming a well-defined idea of them at this distance, yet, on the spot, these difficulties exist but in a small degree. The individuals there employed in the details of buying, selling, and locating, possess local informations of the parts which concern them, so as to be able to keep clear of each other's rights; or, if in some instances a conflict of claims should arise, from any want of certainty in their definition, a local Judge will doubtless be provided to decide them without delay, at least provisionally. Time, instead of clearing up these uncertainties, will cloud them the more, by the death or removal of witnesses, the disappearance of lines and marks, change of parties, and other casualties.

Secretary of State.

OBTAINING FRESH FROM SALT WATER.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred by the House of Representatives of the United States, the petition of Jacob Isaacks, of Newport, in Rhode Island, has examined into the truth and importance of the allegations therein set forth, and makes thereon the following Report:

The petition sets forth, that, by various experiments, with considerable labor and expense, he has discovered a method of converting salt water into fresh, in the proportion of eight pints out of ten, by a process so simple that it may be performed on board of vessels at sea, by the common iron caboose, (with small alteration,) by the same fire and in the same time which is used for cooking the ship's provisions; and offers to convey to the Government of the United States a faithful account of his art, or secret, to be used by or within the United States, on their giving to him a reward suitable to the importance of the discovery, and, in the opinion of Government, adequate to his expenses and the time he has devoted to the bringing it into effect.

In order to ascertain the merit of the petitioner's discovery, it becomes necessary to examine the advances already made in the art of converting salt water into fresh.

Lord Bacon, to whom the world is indebted for the first germs of so many branches of science, had observed, that, with a heat sufficient for distillation, salt will not rise in vapor, and that salt water distilled, is fresh. And it would seem that all mankind might have observed, that the earth is supplied with fresh water chiefly by exhalation from the sea, which is in fact an insensible distillation effected by the heat of the sun. Yet this, though the most obvious, was not the first idea in the essays for converting salt water into fresh. Filtration was tried in vain, and congelation could be resorted to only in the coldest regions and seasons. In all the earlier trials by distillation, some mixture was thought necessary to aid the operation by a partial precipitation of the salt, and other foreign matters contained in sea water. Of this kind were the methods of Sir Richard Hawkins, in the sixteenth century; of Glauber, Houton, and Lister, in the seventeenth century; and of Hales, Appleby, Butler, Chapman, Hoffman, and Dove, in the eighteenth century: nor was there anything in these methods worthy noting on the present occasion, except the very simple still, contrived extempore by Captain Chapman, and made from such materials as are to be found on board every ship, great or small. This was a common pot with a wooden lid of the usual form, in the centre of which a hole was bored to receive perpendicularly a short wooden tube, made with an inch and half auger, which perpendicular tube received at its top, and at an acute angle, another tube of wood also, which descended till it joined a third, of pewter, made by rolling up a dish, and passing it obliquely through a cask of cold water. With this simple machine he obtained two quarts of fresh water an hour, and observed, that the expense of fuel would be very trifling, if the still was contrived to stand on the fire along with the ship's boiler.

In 1762, Dr. Lind, proposing to make experiments of several different mixtures, first distilled rain water, which he supposed would be the purest, and then sea water, without any mixture, which he expected would be the least pure, in order to arrange between these two supposed extremes the degree of merit of the several ingredients he meant to try. "To his great surprise," as he confesses, "the sea water, distilled without any mixture, was as pure as the rain water." He pursued the discovery, and established the fact that a pure and potable fresh water may be obtained from salt water by simple distillation, without the aid of any mixture for fining or precipitating its foreign contents. In 1767, he proposed an extempore still, which, in fact, was Chapman's, only substituting a gun-barrel instead of Chapman's pewter tube, and the hand-pump of the ship to be cut in two obliquely, and joined again at an acute angle, instead of Chapman's wooden tubes bored express; or, instead of the wooden lid and upright tube, he proposed a tea-kettle (without its lid or handle) to be turned bottom upward over the mouth of the pot, by way of still-head, and a wooden tube leading from the spout to a gun-barrel passing through a cask of water, the whole luted with equal parts of chalk and meal moistened with salt water.

With this apparatus of a pot, tea-kettle, and gun-barrel, the Dolphin, a twenty-gun ship, in her voyage round the world, in 1761, from fifty-six gallons of sea water, and with nine pounds of wood and sixty-nine pounds of pit-coal, made forty-two gallons of good fresh water, at the rate of eight gallons an hour. The Dorsetshire, in her passage from Gibraltar to Mahon, in 1769, made nineteen quarts of pure water in four hours, with ten pounds of wood. And the Stambel, in 1773, between Bombay and Bengal, with a hand-pump, made ten quarts of fresh water in three hours.

In 1771, Dr. Irvin, putting together Lind's idea of distilling without a mixture, Chapman's still, and Dr. Franklin's method of cooling by evaporation, obtained a premium of £5,000 from the British Parliament. He wet his tube constantly with a mop, instead of passing it through a cask of water. He enlarged its bore, also, in order to give it a freer passage to the vapor, and thereby increase its quantity by lessening the resistance or pressure on the evaporating surface. This last improvement was his own, and it doubtless contributed to the success of his models; and we may suppose the enlargement of the tube to be useful to that point at which the central parts of the vapor, passing through it, would begin to escape condensation. Lord Mulgrave used his method in his voyage towards the North Pole, in 1773, making from thirty-four to forty gallons of fresh water a day, without any great addition of fuel, as he says.

M. de Bougainville, in his voyage round the world, used, very successfully, a still which had been contrived in 1763, by Poyssonier, so as to guard against the water being thrown over from the boiler into the pipe by the agitation of the ship. In this, one singularity was that the furnace or fire-box was in the middle of the boiler, so that the water surrounded it in contact. This still, however, was expensive, and occupied much room.

Such were the advances already made in the art of obtaining fresh from salt water, when Mr. Isaacks, the petitioner, suggested his discovery.

As the merit of this could be ascertained by experiment only, the Secretary of State asked the favor of Mr. Rittenhouse, President of the American Philosophical Society, of Dr. Wistar, President of Chemistry in the College of Philadelphia, and Dr. Hutchinson, Professor of Chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, to be present at the experiments. Mr. Isaacks fixed the pot of a small caboose, with a tin cap and straight tube of tin passing obliquely through a cask of cold water; he made use of a mixture, the composition of which he did not explain, and from twenty-four pints of sea water, taken up about three miles out of the Capes of Delaware at flood tide, he distilled twenty-two pints of fresh water in four hours, with twenty pounds of seasoned pine, which was a little wetted by having lain in the rain.

In a second experiment, of the 21st of March, performed in a furnace and five gallon still at the College, from thirty-two pints of sea water he drew thirty-one pints of fresh water in seven hours and twenty-four minutes, with fifty-one pounds of hickory, which had been cut about six months. In order to decide whether Mr. Isaacks's mixture contributed in any and what degree to the success of the operation, it was thought proper to repeat his experiment under the same circumstances exactly, except the omission of the mixture. Accordingly, on the next day, the same quantity of sea water was put into the same still, the same furnace was used, and fuel from the same parcel. It yielded, as his had done, thirty-one pints of fresh water in eleven minutes more of time, and with ten pounds less of wood.

On the 24th of March, Mr. Isaacks performed a third experiment. For this, a common iron pot, of three and a half gallons, was fixed in brick-work, and the flue from the hearth wound once round the pot spirally, and then passed off up a chimney. The cap was of tin, and a straight tin tube of about two inches diameter, passing obliquely through a barrel of water, served instead of a worm. From sixteen pints of sea water he drew off fifteen pints of fresh water, in two hours and fifty-five minutes, with three pounds of dry hickory and eight pounds of seasoned pine. This experiment was also repeated the next day, with the same apparatus and fuel from the same parcel, but without the mixture. Sixteen pints of sea water yielded, in like manner, fifteen pints of fresh, in one minute more of time, and with half a pound less of wood. On the whole, it was evident that Mr. Isaacks's mixture produced no advantage, either in the process or result of the distillation. The distilled water in all these instances was found, on experiment, to be as pure as the best pump water of the city. Its taste, indeed, was not as agreeable, but it was not such as to produce any disgust. In fact we drink, in common life, in many places, and under many circumstances, and almost always at sea, a worse tasted and probably a less wholesome water.

The obtaining fresh from salt water, for ages was considered as an important desideratum for the use of navigators. The process for doing this by simple distillation is so efficacious, the erecting an extempore still with such utensils as are found on board of every ship, is so practicable, as to authorize the assertion that this desideratum is satisfied to a very useful degree. But, though this has been done for upwards of thirty years; though its reality has been established by the actual experience of several vessels which have had recourse to it, yet neither the fact nor process is known to the mass of seamen, to whom it would be the most useful, and for whom it was principally wanted.

The Secretary of State is therefore of opinion that, since the subject has been brought under observation, it should be made the occasion of disseminating its knowledge generally and effectually among the sea-faring citizens of the United States. The following is one of the many methods which might be proposed for doing this: Let the clearance for every vessel sailing from the ports of the United States be printed on paper, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the essays which have been made for obtaining fresh from salt water, mentioning briefly those which were unsuccessful, and, more fully, those which have succeeded; describing the methods which have been found to answer for constructing extempore stills of such implements as are generally on board of every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette on their return to the United States, or communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements or new ideas which may occur to them in practice.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 21, 1791.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

UNITED STATES, January 16, 1792.

SIR: As the circumstances which have engaged the United States in the present Indian War may some of them be out of the public recollection, and others perhaps be unknown, it may appear advisable that you prepare and publish, from authentic documents, a statement of those circumstances, as well as of the measures which have been taken, from time to time, for the re-establishment of peace and friendship.

When the community are called upon for considerable exertions, to relieve a part which is suffering under the hand of an enemy, it is desirable to manifest that due pains have been taken by those intrusted with the administration of their affairs to avoid the evil.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary for the Department of War.

The Causes of the existing Hostilities between the United States and certain Tribes of Indians, Northwest of the Ohio, stated and explained from official and authentic Documents, and published in obedience to the orders of the President of the United States.

A recurrence to the Journals of the United States in Congress assembled, of the early stages of the late war, will evince the public solicitude to preserve peace with the Indian tribes, and to prevent their engaging in a contest in which they were no wise interested.

But though partial treaties or conventions were formed with some of the Northern and Western tribes, in the years 1775 and 1776, yet those treaties were too feeble to resist the powerful impulses of a contrary nature, arising from a combination of circumstances at that time; and accordingly all the various Indian nations (the Oneidas, Tuscaroras, and a few individuals of the Delawares, excepted) lying on our frontiers, from Georgia to Canada, armed against us.

It is yet too recent to have been forgotten, that great numbers of inoffensive men, women, and children, fell a sacrifice to the barbarous warfare practised by the Indians, and many others were dragged into a deplorable captivity.

Notwithstanding that these aggressions were entirely unprovoked, yet as soon as the war ceased with Great Britain, the United States, instead of indulging any resentments against the Indian nations, sought only how to establish a liberal peace with all the tribes throughout their limits.

Early measures were accordingly taken for this purpose. A treaty was held, and a peace concluded, in the year 1784, with the hostile part of the Northern Indians, or Six Nations, at Fort Stanwix.

In January, 1785, another treaty was formed with part of the Western tribes, at Fort McIntosh, on the Ohio, to wit: with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, and Chippewas.

During the same year, treaties were formed at Hopewell, on the Keowee, with all the powerful tribes of the South, excepting the Creeks, to wit: the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws.

In January, 1786, a treaty was formed with the Shawanese, at the confluence of the Great Miami with the Ohio.

It was not long before certain turbulent and malignant characters residing among some of the northern and western tribes, which had formed the treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh, excited uneasiness and complaints against those treaties. In consequence of representations upon this subject, on the 5th of October, 1787, Congress directed, "That a general treaty should be held with the tribes of Indians within the limits of the United States, inhabiting the country Northwest of the Ohio, and about Lake Erie, as soon after the first of April next as conveniently might be, and at such place and at such particular time as the Governor of the Western Territory should appoint, for the purpose of knowing the causes of uneasiness among the said tribes, and hearing their complaints; of regulating trade, and amicably settling all affairs concerning lands and boundaries, between them and the United States."

On the 2d day of July, 1788, Congress appropriated "the sum of twenty thousand dollars, in addition to fourteen thousand dollars before appropriated, for defraying the expenses of the treaties which had been ordered, or which might be ordered to be held in the present year, with the several Indian tribes in the Northern Department, and for extinguishing the Indian claims; the whole of the said twenty thousand dollars, together with six thousand dollars of the said fourteen thousand dollars, to be applied solely to the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims to the lands they had already ceded to the United States, by obtaining regular conveyances for the same, and for extending a purchase beyond the limits theretofore fixed by treaty; but that no part of the said sums should be applied for any purpose other than those above mentioned."

Accordingly new treaties were held at Fort Harmar the latter part of the year 1788, and concluded on the 9th day of January, 1789, with a representation of all the Six or Northern Nations, the Mohawks excepted; and with a representation of the following tribes, to wit: the Wyandots, the Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawatomies, and Sacs. By these treaties, nearly the same boundaries were recognised and established by a principle of purchase, as had been stipulated by the former treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh.

Thus careful and attentive was the Government of the United States to settle a boundary with the Indians on the basis of fair treaty, to obviate the dissatisfactions which had been excited, and to establish its claim to the lands relinquished, on the principle of equitable purchase.

It does not appear that the right of the Northern and Western Indians, who formed the several before mentioned treaties to the lands thereby relinquished to the United States, has been questioned by any other tribes; nor does it appear that the present war has been occasioned by any dispute relatively to the boundaries established by the said treaties. But, on the contrary, it appears that the unprovoked aggressions of the Miami and Wabash Indians, upon Kentucky and other parts of the frontier, together with their associates—a banditti, formed of Shawanese and outcast Cherokees, amounting in all to about one thousand two hundred men—are solely the causes of the war. Hence it is proper that their conduct should be more particularly adverted to.

In the year 1784, when messages were sent to the Wyandots and Delawares, inviting them to meet the Commissioners, first at Cuyahoga, and afterwards at Fort McIntosh, the Miami Indians were also included in the said invitations, but they did not attend.

In the year 1785, these invitations were repeated; but the messengers, upon their arrival at the Miami village, had their horses stolen, were otherwise treated with insolence, and prevented from fulfilling their mission.

In the years 1787 and 1788, new endeavors were used to bring those Indians to treat. They were urged to be present at the treaty appointed to be held at Fort Harmar; but these endeavors proved as fruitless as all the former.

At a Council of the Tribes, convened in 1788, at the Miami river, the Miami and Wabash Indians were pressed to repair to the treaty, with great earnestness, by the chiefs of the Wyandots and Delawares; the Wyandot chiefs particularly presented them with a large belt of wampum, holding one end of it themselves, and offering the other to the hostile Indians, which was refused. The Wyandots then laid it on the shoulders of a principal chief, recommending to him to be at peace with the Americans; but, without making any answer, he leaned himself, and let it fall to the ground; this so displeased the Wyandots, that they immediately left the Council-house.

In the mean time the frontier settlements were disquieted by frequent depredations and murders, and the complaints of their inhabitants (as might be expected) of the pacific forbearance of the Government, were loud, repeated, and distressing—their calls for protection incessant—till at length they appeared determined by their own efforts to endeavor to retaliate the injuries they were continually receiving, and which had become intolerable.

In this state of things it was indispensable for the Government to make some decisive exertion for the peace and security of the frontier.

But notwithstanding the ill success of former experiments, and the invincible spirit of animosity which had appeared in certain tribes, and which was of a nature to justify a persuasion that no impression could be made upon them by pacific exhortations, it was still deemed advisable to make one more essay.

Accordingly, in April, 1790, Anthony Gamelin, an inhabitant of Post Vincennes, and a man of good character, was despatched to all the tribes and villages of the Wabash river, and to the Indians of the Miami village, with a message, purporting that the United States were desirous of establishing a general peace with all the neighboring tribes of Indians, and of treating them in all respects with perfect humanity and kindness; and at the same time warning them to abstain from further depredations.

The Indians in some of the villages on the lower part of the Wabash, appeared to listen to him; others manifested a different disposition; others confessed their inability to restrain their young warriors; and all referred the messenger to the Indians at the Miami village. At this village some appeared well disposed, but the chiefs of the Shawanese returned the messages and belts, informing the messenger, however, that they would, after consultation, within thirty nights, send an answer to Post Vincennes. The promised answer was never received. While the messenger was at the Miami village, two negroes were brought in from our settlements, prisoners; and upon his return to L'Anguille, a chief informed him that a party of seventy warriors, from the more distant Indians, had arrived, and were gone against the settlements.

In three days after his departure from the Miami village, a prisoner was there burnt to death. Similar cruelties were exercised at the Ouittanon towns, about the same time; and, in the course of three months, immediately after the last mentioned invitation, upwards of one hundred persons were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, upon the Ohio, and in the district of Kentucky.

It is to be remarked, that previously to the last invitation, the people of Kentucky, who, in consequence of their injuries, were meditating a blow against the hostile Indians, (as before intimated,) were restrained by the President of the UNITED STATES from crossing the Ohio, until the effect of the friendly overture, intended to be made, should be known.

It is also to be observed, that the Wyandots and Delawares, after having frequently and fruitlessly endeavored to influence the Miami and Wabash Indians to peace, upon mature conviction, finally declared that force only could effect the object.

As an evidence that the conduct of the hostile Indians has been occasioned by other motives than a claim relatively to boundaries, it is to be observed that their depredations have been principally upon the district of Kentucky, and the counties of Virginia, lying along the south side of the Ohio, a country to which they have no claim.

It appears, by respectable evidence, that from the year 1783 until the month of October, 1790, the time the United States commenced offensive operations against the said Indians, that on the Ohio, and the frontiers on the south side thereof, they killed, wounded, and took prisoners, about one thousand five hundred men, women, and children, besides carrying off two thousand horses, and other property, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars.

The particulars of the barbarities exercised upon many of the prisoners, of different ages and sexes, although supported by indisputable evidence, are of too shocking a nature to be presented to the public. It is sufficient upon this head to observe, that the tomahawk and scalping knife have been the mildest instruments of death. That in some cases torture by fire, and other execrable means, have been used.

But the outrages which were committed upon the frontier inhabitants, were not the only injuries that were sustained; repeated attacks upon detachments of the troops of the United States were at different times made. The following, from its peculiar enormity, deserves recital. In April, 1790, Major Doughty was ordered to the friendly Chickasaws, on public business. He performed this duty in a boat, having with him Ensign Sedam, and a party of fifteen men. While ascending the Tennessee river, he was met by a party of forty Indians, in four canoes, consisting principally of the aforesaid banditti of Shawanese and outcast Cherokees. They approached under a white flag, the well known emblem of peace. They came on board the Major's boat, received his presents, continued with him nearly one hour, and then departed in the most friendly manner; but, they had scarcely cleared his oars, before they poured in a fire upon his crew, which was returned as soon as circumstances would permit, and a most unequal combat was sustained for several hours, when they abandoned their design, but not until they had killed and wounded eleven out of fifteen of the boat's crew. This perfidious conduct, in any age, would have demanded exemplary punishment.

All overtures of peace failing, and the depredations still continuing, an attempt at coercion became indispensable. Accordingly the expedition under Brigadier General Harmar, in the month of October, 1790, was directed. The event is known.

After this expedition, the Governor of the Western Territory, in order that nothing might be omitted to effect a peace without further conflict, did, on his arrival at Fort Harmar, in December, 1790, send through the Wyandots and Delawares, conciliatory messages to the Miamies, but still without effect.

The Cornplanter, a war chief of the Senecas, and other Indians of the same tribe, being in Philadelphia in the month of February, 1791, were engaged to undertake to impress the hostile Indians with the consequences of their persisting in the hostilities, and also of the justice and moderation of the United States. In pursuance of this design, Colonel Procter, on the 14th of March, was sent to the Cornplanter, to hasten his departure, and to accompany him to the Miami village; and messages were sent to the Indians, declaratory of the pacific sentiments of the United States towards them. But both Colonel Procter and the Complanter, although zealously desirous of executing their mission, encountered difficulties of a particular nature, which were insurmountable, and prevented the execution of their orders.

Major General St. Clair, in the month of April, sent messages from Fort Harmar to the Delaware, Shawnee, and other Indian tribes, expressing the United States to all the Indian tribes.

A treaty was held at the Painted Post, by Colonel Pickens, in June, 1791, with a part of the Six Nations, at which the humane intentions of the General Government towards them particularly, and the Indian tribes generally, were fully explained.

Captain Hendricks, a respectable Indian residing with the Oneidas, appearing zealously disposed to attempt convincing the hostile Indians of their mistaken conduct, was accordingly sent for that purpose, but was frustrated by unforeseen obstacles in his laudable attempts.

The different measures which have been recited, must evince that, notwithstanding the highly culpable conduct of the Indians in question, the Government of the United States, uninfluenced by the resentment or any false principles which might arise from a consciousness of superiority, adopted every proper expedient to terminate the Indian hostilities, without having recourse to the last extremity; and, after being compelled to resort to it, has still kept steadily in view the re-establishment of peace, as its primary and sole object.

Were it necessary to add proofs of the pacific and humane dispositions of the General Government towards the Indian tribes, the treaties with the Creeks and with the Cherokees might be cited as demonstrative of its moderation and liberality.

The present partial Indian war is a remnant of the late general war, continued by a number of separate banditti, who, by the incessant practice of fifteen years, seem to have formed inveterate and incurable habits of enmity against the frontier inhabitants of the United States.

To obtain protection against lawless violence, was a main object for which the present Government was instituted: it is, indeed, a main object of all Governments. A frontier citizen possesses as strong claims to protection as any other citizen. The frontiers are the vulnerable parts of every country; and the obligation of the Government of the United States, to afford the requisite protection, cannot be less sacred in reference to the inhabitants of their Western, than to those of their Atlantic frontier.

It will appear, from a candid review of this subject, that the General Government could no longer abstain from attempting to punish the hostile Indians.

The ill success of the attempts for this purpose, is entirely unconnected with the justice or policy of the measure. A perseverance in exertions to make the refractory Indians at last sensible that they cannot continue their enormous outrages with impunity, appears to be as indispensable, in the existing posture of things, as it will be advisable, whenever they shall manifest symptoms of a more amicable disposition, to convince them, by decisive proofs, that nothing is so much desired by the United States as to be at liberty to treat them with kindness and beneficence.

Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Jan. 26, 1792.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

UNITED STATES, December 12, 1791.
*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

It is with great concern that I communicate to you the information received from Major General St. Clair, of the misfortune which has befallen the troops under his command.

Although the national loss is considerable, according to the scale of the event, yet it may be repaired without great difficulty, excepting as to the brave men who have fallen on the occasion, and who are a subject of public as well as private regret.

A further communication will shortly be made of all such matters as shall be necessary to enable the Legislature to judge of the future measures which it may be proper to pursue.

G. WASHINGTON.

A Letter from General St. Clair, dated

FORT WASHINGTON, October 6, 1791.

Sir: I have now the satisfaction to inform you that the Army moved from Fort Hamilton, the name I have given to the fort on the Miami, on the 4th, at eight in the morning, under the command of General Butler.

The order of march and encampment I had regulated before, and on the third returned to this place to get up the militia. They marched yesterday, and consist of but about three hundred men, as you will see by the enclosed abstract of the muster. I have reason to believe, however, that at least an equal number will be up here by the 10th, and I have left orders for their following us. The monthly return should have accompanied this Letter, but it was not ready when I left camp, and has not been forwarded since. I have hitherto found it impossible to reduce the officers commanding corps to punctuality with respect to their returns, but they are mending. Our number, after deducting the garrisons of this place and Fort Hamilton, are about two thousand, exclusive of the militia. I trust, I shall find them sufficient, and should the rest of the militia come on, it will make the matter pretty certain; but the season is now so far advanced, that I fear the intermediate posts, which would, indeed, have been highly necessary, it will be impossible to establish. In that, however, I must be governed by circumstances, of which I will take care that you shall be apprised in due time. Should the enemy come to meet us, which seems to be expected, and be discomfited, there will be no difficulties, but if they expect us at the Miami villages, the business will wear another face, and the intermediate posts become more essential.

Since the Quartermaster has been here, and got into his gears, which it took him a little time to do, I am very well satisfied with him, and do believe he will answer the description which you was pleased to give me of him; his business seems now to be well arranged.

In order to communicate with some degree of certainty with your office, I have directed Captain Buel, when he arrives, to send a Sergeant and twelve men to a house that has been newly erected, half-way between this place and Lexington, to each of which two men are to be sent off on every Monday morning to carry despatches. Those for the War Office, or any other public letters, to be put into the hands of Mr. Charles Wilkins, merchant of Lexington, who has engaged to forward all I have occasion to send, regularly, once a fortnight; and should you, sir, think proper to use the same route for any of yours, if they are sent to his care, he will forward them to me. I have been led to prefer this channel of communication to that of the river, because it appears to be rather the more certain of two, though it may be a little more tedious, and because desertion continues to prevail among the troops, and the sending small parties to such a distance gives great opportunity to effect it. General Butler informs me that no less than twenty-one went off the night before the Army moved from Fort Hamilton. I am this moment, setting out for the Army, which I hope to overtake to-morrow evening, and will write to you again, as soon after as may be.

With great regard and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very humble servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The Hon. H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

A Letter from General St. Clair, dated Camp, 81 miles advanced of Fort Washington, November 1, 1791.

Sir: Since I had the honor to write to you on the 21st instant, nothing very material has happened, and indeed, I am at present so unwell, and have been so for some time past, that I could ill detail it, if it had happened, not that that space of time has been entirely barren of incidents, but as few of them have been of the agreeable kind, I beg you to accept a sort of journal account of them, which will be the easiest for me.

On the 22d, the indisposition that had hung about me for some time, sometimes appearing as a bilious cholic, and sometimes as a rheumatic asthma, to my great satisfaction changed to a gout in the left arm and hand, leaving the breast and stomach perfectly relieved, and the cough, which had been excessive, entirely gone. This day, Mr. Ellis, with sixty militia from Kentucky, joined the Army, and brought up a quantity of flour and beef.

23d. Two men taken in the act of deserting to the enemy, and one for shooting another soldier, and threatening to kill an officer, were hanged upon the grand parade, the whole Army being drawn out; since the Army has halted, the country around this, and a-head for fifteen miles, has been well examined, it is a country which, had we arrived a month sooner in it, and with three times the number of animals, they would have been all fat now.

24th. Named the fort, Jefferson, (it lies it lat. 50. 4. 22 N.) and marched the same Indian path, serving to conduct us about six miles, and encamped on good ground and an excellent position; a rivulet in front and a very large drain, which would at the proper season afford forage for a thousand horses on the left. So ill this day that I had much difficulty in keeping with the Army.

25th. Very hard rains last night, obliged to halt to-day on account of provisions, for though the soldiers may be kept pretty easy in camp under the expectation of provisions arriving, they cannot bear to march in advance, and take none along with them; received a letter from Mr. Hodgson, by express; 1,300 pounds flour will arrive the 27th.

26th. A party of militia, sent to reconnoitre, fell in with five Indians and suffered them to slip through their fingers. In their camp, articles to the value of $22 were found and divided. The Virginia battalion is melting down very fast, notwithstanding the promises of the men to the officers. Thirteen have been discharged by Colonel Darke to-day.

27th. Gave orders for enlisting the levies, with the condition of serving out their time in the present corps. Payamingo arrived in camp with his warriors. I was so unwell, could only see him and bid him welcome; but entered on no business. Considerable dissatisfaction among the levies about their enlistments.

28th. Some clothing sent for to Fort Washington for the recruits arrived; was begun to be distributed, and will have a good effect; but the enlisting the levies does not meet with the encouragement that might have been expected. It is not openly complained of by the officers, but it is certainly privately by some of high rank; and the measure of tempting them with warm clothing, condemned. Mr. Hodgson writes me, that he is sending forward a quantity of woolen overalls and socks, by General Butler's orders. I have ordered them to be deposited at Fort Jefferson. Some few Indians about us, probably those the militia fell in with a day or two ago. Two of the levies were fired upon about three miles off; one killed; two of the militia likewise. One of them got in, and the other missing, supposed to be taken.

29th. Payamingo and his people, accompanied by Captain Sparks, and four good riflemen, going on a scout, they do not propose to return under ten days, unless they sooner succeed in taking prisoners.

30th. The Army moved about nine o'clock, and with much difficulty made seven miles, having left a considerable part of the tents by the way; the provision made by the Quartermaster for that purpose was not adequate—three days' flour issued to the men, to add the horses that carried it to his arrangements—the Indian road still with us; the course of this day N. 25 W.

31st. This morning about sixty of the militia deserted; it was at first reported that one-half of them had gone off, and that their design was to plunder the convoys which were upon the road.

Defeat of General St. Clair.

I detached the first regiment in pursuit of them, with orders to Major Hamtramck to send a sufficient guard back with Benham (a Commissary) whenever he met with them, and follow them about twenty-five miles below Fort Jefferson, or until he met the second convoy, and then return and join the Army. Benham arrived last night; and to-day, November 1st, the Army is halted to give the road-cutters an opportunity of getting some distance ahead, and that I might write to you. I am this day considerably recovered, and hope that it will turn out, what I at first expected would be, a friendly fit of the gout come to relieve me from every other complaint.

Yesterday I was favored with your's of the 28th and 29th of September. I have enclosed my communications with the old and new contractors, and their answers. My orders from the posts to them are not yet definitive, but they will be very soon. In the mean time, I expect they are both at work.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

To the Hon. H. Knox, Secretary of War.

P. S. Your Letters for General Wilkinson and General Scott, Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown, are sent back; and the public thanks, in the name of the President, presented to General Wilkinson, agreeably to your directions.

Copy of a Letter from Major General St. Clair, to the Secretary for the Department of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, November 9, 1791.

Sir: Yesterday afternoon the remains of the Army under my command got back to this place, and I have now the painful task to give you an account of as warm, and as unfortunate an action as almost any that has been fought, in which every corps was engaged and worsted, except the first regiment, that had been detached upon a service I had the honor to inform you of in my last despatch, and had not joined me.

On the 3d instant, the Army had reached a creek about twelve yards wide running to the southward of west, which I believe to have been the river St. Mary, that empties into the Miami of the lake; arrived at the village about four o'clock in the afternoon, having marched near nine miles, and were immediately encamped upon a very commanding piece of ground in two lines, having the above-mentioned creek in front, the right wing composed of Butler's, Clarke's, and Patterson's battalions, commanded by Major General Butler, formed the first line, and the left wing consisting of Bedinger's and Gaither's battalions, and the second regiment commanded by Colonel Darke formed the second line, with an interval between them of about seventy yards, which was all the ground would allow.

The right flank was pretty well secured by the creek, a steep bank, and Faulkner's corps, some of the cavalry and their picquets cover the left flank; the militia were thrown over the creek, and advanced about one quarter of a mile, and encamped in the same order, there were a few line, another charge was made upon the enemy, as if with the design to turn their right flank, but, in fact, to gain the road; this was effected; and, as soon as it was open, the militia took along it, followed by the troops, Major Clark, with his battalion, covering the rear.

The retreat, in those circumstances, was, you may be sure, a very precipitate one: it was, in fact, a flight. The camp and the artillery were abandoned, but that was unavoidable, for not a horse was left alive to have drawn it off, had it otherwise been practicable. But the most disgraceful part of the business is, that the greatest part of the men threw away their arms and accoutrements, even after the pursuit, which continued about four miles, had ceased. I found the road strewn with them for many miles, but was not able to remedy it; for, having had all my horses killed, and being mounted upon one that could not be pricked out of a walk, I could not get forward half the front, or to prevent the men from parting with their arms, were unattended to. The route continued quite to Fort Jefferson, 29 miles, which began about half an hour before sunrise, and the retreat was attempted at half an hour after nine o'clock.

I have not yet been able to get returns of the killed and wounded; but Major General Butler, Lieutenant Colonel Oldham, of the militia, Major Ferguson, Major Hart, and Major Clarke, are among the former. Colonel Sargent, my Adjutant General, Lieutenant Colonel Darke, Lieutenant Colonel Gibson, Major Butler, and the Viscount Malletie, who served me as an aid-de-camp, are among the latter, and a great number of Captains and subalterns in both.

I have now, sir, finished my melancholy tale—a tale that will be felt sensibly by every one that has sympathy for private distress, or for public misfortune. I have nothing, sir, to lay to the charge of the troops but their want of discipline, which, from the short time they had been in service, it was impossible they should have acquired, and which rendered it very difficult, when they were thrown into confusion, to reduce them again to order, which is one reason why the loss has fallen so heavy upon the officers, who did every thing in their power to effect it. Neither were my own exertions wanting; but, worn down with illness, and suffering under a painful disease, unable either to mount or to dismount a horse without assistance, they were not so great as they otherwise would, and perhaps ought, to have been. We were overpowered by numbers, but it is no more than justice to observe, that, though composed of so many different species of troops, the utmost harmony prevailed through the whole Army during the campaign.

At Fort Jefferson, I found the first regiment, which had returned from the service they had been sent upon, without either overtaking the deserters, or meeting the convoy of provisions. I am not certain, sir, whether I ought to consider the absence of this regiment from the field of action as fortunate or otherwise. I incline to think it was fortunate; for I very much doubt whether, had it been in the action, the fortune of the day had been turned: and, if it had not, the triumph of the enemy would have been more complete, and the country would have been destitute of every means of defence.

Taking a view of the situation of our broken troops at Fort Jefferson, and that there were no provisions in the fort, I called on the field officers, viz: Lieutenant Colonel Darke, Major Hamtramck, Major Zeigler, and Major Gaither, together with the Adjutant General, for their advice what would be proper further to be done; and it was their unanimous opinion that the addition of the first regiment, unbroken as it was, did not put the Army on so respectable a footing as it was in the morning, because a great part of it was now unarmed; that it had been then found unequal to the enemy, and should they come on, which was probable, would be found so again; that the troops could not be thrown into the fort, both because it was too small, and that there were no provisions in it; that provisions were known to be upon the road, at the distance of one, or, at most, two marches; that, therefore, it would be proper to move, without loss of time, to meet the provisions when the men might have the sooner an opportunity of some refreshment, and that a proper detachment might be sent back with it, to have it safely deposited in the fort. This advice was accepted, and the Army was put in motion again at ten o'clock, and marched all night, and the succeeding day met with a quantity of flour; part of it was distributed immediately, part taken back to supply the Army on the march to Fort Hamilton, and the remainder, about fifty horse-loads, sent forward to Fort Jefferson. The next day a drove of cattle was met with for the same place; and I have information that both got in. The wounded who had been left at that place were ordered to be brought here by the return of the horses.

I have said, sir, in a former part of this letter, that we were overpowered by numbers; of that, however, I have no evidence: but the weight of the fire, which was always a most deadly one, and generally delivered from the ground, few of the enemy showing themselves aloft, except when they were charged, and that, in a few minutes, our whole camp, which extended above three hundred and fifty yards in length, was entirely surrounded and attacked on all quarters.

The loss, sir, the public has sustained, by the fall of so many officers, particularly General Butler and Major Ferguson, cannot be too much regretted; but it is a circumstance that will alleviate the misfortune in some measure, that all of them fell most gallantly, doing their duty. I have had very particular obligations to many of them, as well as to the survivors; but to none more than to Colonel Sargent. He has discharged the various duties of his office with zeal, with exactness, and with intelligence; and, on all occasions, afforded me every assistance in his power, which I have also experienced from my Aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Denny, and the Viscount Malerlie, who served with me in the station as a volunteer. With every sentiment of respect and regard, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.
The Hon. H. Knox, Secretary of War.

P. S.—Some orders that had been given to Colonel Oldham over night, and which were of much consequence, were not executed, and some very material intelligence was communicated by Captain Slough to General Butler, in the course of the night before the action, which was never imparted to me, nor did I hear of it until after my arrival here.

List of the killed and wounded officers in the battle of the 4th of November, 1791.

REDUCTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 19th instant, respectfully makes the following Report:

At the close of the year 1790 there was a considerable surplus of revenue beyond the objects of expenditure which had required a provision to that period; which surplus, by an act of the 12th of August in that year, was appropriated to the reduction of the Public Debt. The statement (A) herewith submitted will show, in one view, all the sums which, according to the establishments heretofore made, and corresponding appropriations, have required and will require to be defrayed, from the beginning of the year 1791 to the end of the year 1792, amounting together to $7,029,755 74. The statement (B) will also show, in one view, the nett product of all the public revenues for the same period, according to the best calculation and estimate which can now be formed of it, amounting to $7,029,755 26 cents. The statement (C) exhibits a summary of the total annual expenditure of the United States, in conformity to exist-

Total of nett revenue for the years 1791 and 1792 - 3,700,000 00

(A.) The produce of these three quarters may be considered as ascertained. Though returns have not been received from all the ports for the entire period, yet so many have been received (including the principal ports) as to have admitted of a calculation, with regard to the rest, not liable to material error. The produce for the year 1790 has served as a guide in respect to ports from which returns have not been received.

(B.) The sum here stated is altogether upon estimate, the time which has elapsed since the end of the quarter not admitting of the proper documents. It exceeds the produce of the same quarter for the preceding year $55,773 19. If the ratio of increase of any preceding quarter during the year 1791 had been applied to this quarter, the sum would have been considerably greater. But it is believed that this would not furnish a just rule. It is understood that the importations for the last quarter of 1790 were much increased to avoid the additional duties which were to take place on the first day of the year 1791. And, though the additional duty on distilled spirits might at first view be expected to add to the product for the quarter in question, yet it is far from certain that this was the effect of it. Extraordinary exertions were made to import distilled spirits prior to July, when the additional duty took effect, which may be supposed to have lessened the quantity afterwards, so as to leave it a question whether this article was more or less productive in that quarter than in the same quarter of the former year. Making allowance for these circumstances, it does not appear probable that the last quarter of 1791 will exceed the last quarter of 1790 in so great a proportion as any of the preceding corresponding quarters.

(C.) This sum is materially short of the originally-estimated product; but, from the returns hitherto received, it does not appear likely to be greater. This is owing partly to a decreased distillation of spirits from foreign materials, in consequence of a sudden rise in the price of molasses, and partly to the obstacles which have retarded the complete execution of the law.

(D.) The sum here estimated cannot, in the nature of the thing, be accurate. It includes a compromise of opposite considerations. First, it contemplates an additional sum for the additional duty on imported spirits, which will be fully operative during the present year. Secondly, it contemplates the possibility that the disturbances in Hispaniola may tend to diminish the supply of several articles which are objects of considerable duties, and may proportionably diminish the revenue. Hence about one-third of the probable increase of the duties on spirits is added to the produce of the year 1791, and the aggregate is taken as the produce of the year 1792, abating two-thirds of that increase as an equivalent for other deficiencies.

(E.) The same disturbances in Hispaniola may be expected to diminish the product of the duties on home-made spirits, by considerably reducing the supply of molasses; which, added to the obstacles already alluded to, (and which it will require yet some time completely to surmount,) cannot fail to render the real product of these duties, in the course of the present year, materially less than the estimated product. Accordingly, an abatement of about one-third is made in the present estimate.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith a Report on the subject of the Public Debt, pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the first of November, 1791, and to subsequent references therein mentioned; and to beg your perfect respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.
The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 23, 1792.
Pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the first of November, 1791, directing the Secretary of the Treasury "to report to the House the amount of the subscriptions to the loans proposed by the act making provision for the Public Debt, as well in the debts of the respective States as in the Domestic Debt of the United States, and of the parts which remain unsubscribed, together with such measures as are, in his opinion, expedient to be taken on the subject," the said Secretary respectfully submits the following Report:

I. The whole amount of the Domestic Debt of the United States, principal and interest, which has been subscribed to the loan proposed concerning that Debt, by the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," according to the statement herewith transmitted, marked A, and subject to the observations accompanying that statement, is $31,797,481 22.

Which, pursuant to the terms of that act, has been converted into stock bearing an immediate interest of six per cent. per annum $14,177,450 43

Stock bearing the like interest from the first of January, 1801, 7,088,727 79
Stock bearing an immediate interest of three per cent. per annum - 10,531,303 00

Total - $31,797,481 22

Of which there stands to the credit of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, in consequence of purchases of the Public Debt, made under their direction, the sum of $1,131,364 76.

The unsubscribed residue of the said Debt, according to the statements herewith transmitted, marked B and C, and subject to the observations accompanying the statement C, appears to amount to $10,616,604 65.

Consisting of registered Debt, principal and interest - $6,795,815 26
Unsubscribed stock on the books of the Commissioners of Loans for New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, principal and interest - 15,674 62
Credits on the books of the Treasury, for which no certificates have been issued, principal and interest - 107,648 63
Outstanding or floating evidences of Debt estimated, per statement C, at - 3,697,466 14
Total - $10,616,604 65

Concerning which, some farther arrangement is necessary.

The greatest part of the registered Debt, hitherto subscribed, is owned by citizens of foreign countries; most, if not all, of whom appear now disposed to embrace the terms held out by the act above mentioned; extensive orders having been received from those creditors to subscribe to the loan, after the time for receiving subscriptions had elapsed.

A considerable part of the outstanding or floating Debt consists of loan-office certificates, issued between the first of September, 1777, and the first of March, 1778, bearing interest on the nominal sum. Many of the holders of this species of Debt have come in upon the terms of this act, but others have hitherto declined it; alleging that the special nature of their contract gives a peculiarity to their case, and renders the commutation proposed not so fair an equivalent to them as in other instances. They also complain that the act has had, towards them, a compulsory aspect, by refusing the temporary payment of interest unless they should exchange their old for new certificates, essentially varying the nature of their contract.

A resolution of Congress of the 10th of September, 1777, stipulates in favor of this class of creditors, interest upon the nominal instead of the real principal of their Debt, until that principal be discharged. This certainly renders their contract of a nature more beneficial than that of other creditors; but they are, at the same time, liable to be divested of the extra benefit it gives them by a payment of their specie dues; and it may be observed, that they have actually enjoyed, and by accepting the terms offered to them, were enabled to realize, advantages superior to other creditors. They have been paid interest by bills on France, from the 10th of September, 1777, to the 1st of March, 1782, while other creditors received their interest in depreciated bills of the old emissions; and the terms of the loan proposed put it in their power to realize the benefit of interest on the nominal amount of their respective debts, at rates from six and twenty-one hundredths nearly to ten and forty-seven one hundredths per cent., on their real or specie capital, down to the last of December, 1790.

It does not, therefore, appear to have been an unreasonable expectation that they, as readily as any other description of public creditors, would have acquiesced in a measure calculated for the accommodation of the Government, under circumstances in respect to which it has been demonstrated, by subsequent events, that the accommodation desired was consistent with the best interest of the public creditors. A large proportion of the parties interested have, indeed, viewed the matter in this light, and have embraced the proposition. It is probable that the progress of things will satisfy the remainder that it is equally their interest to concur, if a farther opportunity be afforded. But it is, nevertheless, for themselves only to judge how far the equivalent proposed is in their case a reasonable and fair one; how far any circumstances in their claim may suggest reasons for moderation on their part; or how far any other motives, public or private, ought to induce an acceptance. And the principles of good faith require that their election should be free.

On this ground, the complaint which regards the withholding of a temporary payment of interest, except on the condition of surrender of the old certificates for new ones, importing a contract substantially different, appears to the Secretary not destitute of foundation. He presumes that the operation of that provision, in the particular case, was not adverted to; or, that an exception would have been introduced as most consonant with the general spirit and design of the act. Accordingly, the further measures which will be submitted will contemplate a method of obviating the objection in question.

From the consideration that an extension of the time for receiving stipulations, upon the terms of the act making provision for the Debt of the United States, is desired by a large proportion of the non-subscribing creditors; and from the further consideration that sufficient experience has not yet been had of the productiveness of a considerable branch of the revenues which have been established, to afford the light necessary to a final arrangement, it is, in the judgment of the Secretary, advisable to renew the proposition for a loan in the Domestic Debt, on the same terms with the one which has been closed, and to allow time for receiving subscriptions to it until the last day of September next, inclusively; making provision for a temporary payment of interest to such who may not think fit to subscribe, for the year 1792, of the like nature with that which was made in the same case for the year 1791—except as to the holders of Loan-office certificates, issued between the 1st of September, 1777, and the 1st of March, 1778; in respect to whom it is submitted as proper to dispense with the obligation of exchanging their old certificates for new, as the condition of their receiving interest in capacity of non-subscribers, and to allow them, without such exchange, to receive the same interest, both for the years 1791 and 1792, as if they had subscribed to the first loan. It will not be materially difficult so to regulate the operation at the Treasury as to avoid, in the particular case, that danger of imposition by counterfeits, which was the motive to the general provision for an exchange of certificates.

II. The amount of the subscriptions in the Debts of the respective States, within the limits of the sum assumed in each, appears by the statement marked D to be $17,073,334 39, subject to the observations accompanying that statement. Consequently, the difference between the aggregate of the sums subscribed, and the aggregate of the sums assumed, is $4,427,665 61.

This difference is to be attributed to several causes, the principal of which are the following: First, that the sums assumed in respect to certain States, exceeded the actual amount of their existing debts. Second, that in various instances a part of the existing Debt was in a form which excluded it from being received without contravening particular provisions of the law—as in the case of certificates issued after the 1st day of January, 1790, in lieu of certificates which had been issued prior to that period, which was reported upon by the Secretary on the 25th day of February last. Third, ignorance of, or inattention to, the limitation of time for receiving subscriptions. It appears that a number of persons lost the opportunity of subscribing from the one or the other of these causes.

A strong desire that a further opportunity may be afforded for subscriptions in the debts of the States, has been manifested by the individuals interested. And the States of Rhode Island and New Hampshire have, by the public acts referred to the Secretary, indicated a similar desire. The affording of such further opportunity may either be restricted within the limit as to amount, which is contemplated by the act itself, or may receive an extension which will embrace the residuary debts of the States.

The first may be considered as nothing more than giving full effect to a measure already adopted. The last appears to have in its favor all the leading inducements to what has been already done. The embarrassments which might arise from conflicting systems of finance are not entirely obviated. The efficacious command of the national resources for national exigencies, is not unequivocally secured. The equalizing of the condition of the citizens of every State, and exonerating those of the States most indebted, from partial burdens which would press upon them in consequence of exertions in a common cause, is not completely fulfilled until the entire Debt of every State, contracted in relation to the war, is embraced in one general and comprehensive plan. The inconvenience to the United States of debarring the States, which are still encumbered with considerable debts, would bear no proportion to the inconvenience which they would feel if left to struggle with those debts unpaid. More general contentment, therefore, in the public mind may be expected to attend such an exoneration, than the reverse, in proportion as the experience of actual inconvenience would be greater, though only applicable to parts, in the one than in the other case.

With regard to States, parts only of the debts of which have been assumed, and in proportions short of those which have prevailed in favor of States, and other short also of what would have resulted from a due apportionment of the entire sum assumed, the claim to a further assumption is founded on considerations of equal justice, as relative to the measure itself, considered in a separate and independent light.

But there is a further reason of material weight for an immediate general assumption. Moneyed men, as well as foreigners as citizens, through the expectation of an eventual assumption, or that in some shape or other a substantial provision will be made for the unassumed residue of the State debts, will be induced to speculate in the purchase of them. In proportion as the event is unsettled, or uncertain, the price of the article will be low, and the present proprietors will be under disadvantage in the sale. The loss to them in favor of the purchasers is to be regarded as an evil; and, as far as it is connected with a transfer to foreigners, at an undervalue, it will be a national evil. By whatsoever authority an ultimate provision may be made, there will be an absolute loss to the community equal to the total amount of such undervalue.

It may appear an objection to the measure, that it will require an establishment of additional funds by the Government of the United States. But this does not seem to be a necessary consequence. The probability is, that without a supplementary assumption, an equal, or very nearly equal augmentation of funds will be requisite to provide for greater balances, in favor of certain States, which would be proportionably diminished by such assumption. The destination, not the quantum of the fund, will, therefore, be the chief distinction between the two cases.

It may also appear an objection to a total assumption, that the magnitude of the object is not ascertained with precision. It is not certainly known what is the sum due in each State, nor has it been possible to acquire the information, owing to different causes. But, though precise data are deficient, there are materials which will serve as guides. From the returns received at the Treasury, assisted by information in other ways, it may be stated, without danger of material error, that the remaining debts of the States, over and above the sums already subscribed, will not exceed the amounts specified in statement D, accompanying this Report; and that, including sums already subscribed, the total amount to be ultimately provided for, in the event of a general assumption, will not exceed $25,403,363 71, which would constitute an addition of $3,903,363 71 to the sum of $21,500,000, already assumed. Should a total assumption be deemed eligible, it may still be advisable to assign a determinate sum for each State, that the utmost limit of the operation may be pre-established; and it is necessary in order to the certainty of a due provision, in proper time, that interest should not begin to be payable, on the additional sums assumed, until after the year 1793. It will occur, that provision has been made for paying to each State, in trust for its non-subscribing creditors, an interest upon the difference between the sum assumed for such State, and that actually subscribed, equal to what would have been payable, if it had been subscribed.

In the event of a further assumption, either within the limits already established, or commensurate with the limits remaining debts of the States, it is conceived that it will not be incompatible with the provision just mentioned, to retain, at the end of each quarter, during the progress of the further subscription, out of the money directed to be paid to each State, a sum corresponding with the interest upon so much of its debts as shall have been subscribed to that period, paying the overplus, if any, to the State. An absolute suspension of that payment does not appear consistent with the nature of the stipulation included in that provision; for, though the money to be paid to a State be expressly a trust for the non-subscribing creditors, yet, as it cannot be certain beforehand that they will elect to change their condition, the possibility of it will not justify a suspension of payment to the State, which might operate as suspension of payment to the creditors themselves.

A further objection to such a suspension results from the idea that the provision in question appears to have a secondary object, namely: as a pledge for securing a provision for whatever balance may be found due to a State on the general settlement of accounts. The payment directed to be made to a State is "to continue until there shall be a settlement of accounts between the United States and the individual States; and, in case a balance should then appear in favor of a State, until provision shall be made for the said balance." This secondary operation as a pledge or security (consistently with the intent of the Funding Act) can only be superseded in favor of the primary object, a provision for the creditors, and, as far as may be necessary, to admit them to an effectual participation of it. But, as whatever money may be paid to a State is to be paid over to its creditors, proportional deductions may, with propriety, be made from the debts of those creditors who may hereafter subscribe, so as that the United States may not have to pay twice for the same purpose.

If it shall be judged expedient, either to open again, or extend the assumption, it will be necessary to vary the description of the debts, which may be subscribed, so as to comprehend all those which have relation to services or supplies during the war, under such restrictions as are requisite to guard against abuse.

In the original proposition for an assumption of the State debts, and in the suggestions now made on the same subject, the Secretary has contemplated, and still contemplates, as a material part of the plan, an effectual provision for the sale of the vacant lands of the United States. He has considered this resource as an important mean of sinking a part of the Debt, and facilitating ultimate arrangements concerning the residue. If supplementary funds shall be rendered necessary by an additional assumption, the provision will most conveniently be made at the next session of Congress, when the productiveness of the existing revenues, and the extent of the sum to be provided for will be better ascertained.

There is a part of the Public Debt of the United States which is a cause of some perplexity to the Treasury. It is not comprehended within the existing provision for the Foreign debt, which is confined to loans made abroad; and it is questionable whether it is to be regarded as a portion of the Domestic debt. It is not only due to foreigners, but the interest upon it is payable, by express stipulation, in a foreign country; whence it becomes a matter of doubt, whether it be at all contemplated by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. The part alluded to is that which is due to certain foreign officers who served the United States during the late war. In consequence of a resolution of Congress, directing their interest to be paid to them in France, the certificates which were issued to them specify that "in pursuance of, and compliance with, a certain resolution of Congress of the third day of February, 1784, the said interest is to be paid annually, at the house of Monsieur Le Grand, banker, in Paris." Interest has accordingly been paid to them at Paris, down to the 31st of December, 1788, by virtue of a special resolution of Congress, of the 20th of August in that year; since which period, no payment has been made.

It has been heretofore suggested, as the opinion of the Secretary, that it would be expedient to cause the whole of this description of debt to be paid off, among other reasons, because it bears an interest at six per centum per annum, payable abroad, and can be discharged with a saving. The other reasons alluded to are of a nature both weighty and delicate, and too obvious, it is presumed, to need a specification. Some recent circumstances have served to strengthen the inducements to the measure; but, it should finally be deemed unadvisable, it is necessary, at least, that provision should be made for the interest, which is now suspended, under the doubt that has been stated, and from the want of authority to remit it pursuant to the contract. The amount of this debt, with the arrears of interest to the end of the year 1791, is $220,646 81.

IV. The act making provision for the Debt of the United States has appropriated the proceeds of the Western lands as a fund for the discharge of the Public Debt. And the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt has appropriated all the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the year 1790, to the purpose of purchasing the Debt at the market price, and has authorized the President to borrow the further sum of $2,000,000 for the same object.

These measures serve to indicate the intention of the Legislature, as early and as fast as possible, to provide for the extinguishment of the existing Debt. In pursuance of that intention, it appears advisable that a systematic plan should be begun for the creation and establishment of a Sinking Fund.

An obvious basis of this establishment, which may be immediately contemplated, is the amount of the interest on so much of the Debt as has been or shall be, from time to time, purchased or paid off, or received in discharge of any debt or demand of the United States, made payable in public securities, over and above the interest of any new debt, which may be created in order to such purchase, or payment.

The purchases of the Debt already made have left a sum of interest in the Treasury, which will be increased by future purchases, certain sums payable to the United States in their own securities, will, when received, have a similar effect. And there is ground to calculate on a saving upon the operations which are in execution with regard to the Foreign debt. The sale of the Western lands, when provision shall be made for it, may be expected to produce a material addition to such a fund.

It is, therefore, submitted that it be adopted as a principle, that all interest which shall have ceased to be payable, by any of the means above specified, shall be set apart and appropriated in the most firm and inviolable manner, as a fund for sinking the Public Debt, by purchase or payment; and that the said fund be placed under the direction of the officers named in the second section of the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, to be by them applied towards the purchase of the said Debt, until the annual produce of the said fund shall amount to two per cent. of the entire portion of the Debt which bears a present interest of six per centum, and thenceforth to be applied towards the redemption of that portion of the Debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government.

It will deserve the consideration of the Legislature, whether this fund ought not to be so vested as to acquire the nature and quality of a proprietary trust, incapable of being diverted without a violation of the principles and sanctions of property.

A rapid accumulation of this fund would arise from its own operation; but it is not doubted that the progressive development of the resources of the country, and a reduction of the rate of interest, by the progress of public credit, already exemplified in a considerable degree, will speedily enable the Government to make important additions to it, in various ways. With due attention to preserve order and cultivate peace, a strong expectation may be indulged, that a reduction of the Debt of the country will keep pace with the reasonable hopes of its citizens.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The amount of stock funded at the Treasury to 30th September, 1791, has been ascertained with accuracy; but, at that time, many subscriptions had been made, which have not yet been adjusted for want of proper powers of attorney, and other documents. It is, therefore, probable that, on settlement of all the Loans, the amount will be found somewhat different from what is now represented. The sums funded at the several Loan Offices, it is presumed, are ascertained with accuracy; but, as the loans had not been adjusted in all instances when the returns were made, some immaterial differences will probably hereafter appear.

Estimate of the Outstanding Debt, on the 30th of September, 1791, viz:

The amount of the Domestic Debt of the United States, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his Report of the 9th of January, 1790, to the House of Representatives, relative to a provision for the support of the public credit, is as follows:

Loans.

Liquidated and Loan Office debt, as per schedule C	-	-	-	-	-	$27,383,917 67
Interest thereon to the 31st of December, 1790, per schedule D	-	-	-	-	-	13,030,168 20
Additional sum for sinking the Continental bills of credit, and for the discharge of the other parts of the unliquidated debt	-	-	-	-	-	2,000,000 00
						<hr/> 42,414,085 87
From which deduct amount, as per statement A	-	-	-	-	-	$31,797,481 22
Amount of the registered debt and credit, with interest, per statement B	-	-	-	-	-	6,919,138 51
Balance outstanding	-	-	-	-	-	<hr/> 3,697,466 14

NOTE.—The balance above stated to be outstanding, probably exceeds the real sum. In the original estimate, the old emission bills were computed at forty for one; but they have been provided for, at one hundred for one. There are also Loan Office certificates, which were sent to public officers, to be applied to the public service, and which were supposed to have been so applied, but which have, since, upon settlements of their accounts at the Treasury, been returned and cancelled.

In addition to this, payments in public securities are expected to be made into the Treasury, which will thereupon be cancelled. And it is presumable that, in the course of the war, sums have been lost and destroyed, which are included in the estimate; but, as there is some arrearage of interest not included in the calculation, and as there are certain claims on the Treasury, the event or amount of which is not yet determined, it is not possible now to make a precise estimate of the difference between the sum computed to be outstanding, and what will be really found so.

SPIRITS. FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

SPIRITS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

In obedience to the orders of the House of Representatives, of the first and second days of November last, the first directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House such information as he may have obtained respecting any difficulties which may have occurred in the execution of the act "repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," together with his opinion thereupon. The second directing him to report to the House whether any and what alterations in favor of the spirits which shall be distilled from articles of the growth or produce of the United States, or from foreign articles within the same, can, in his opinion, be made in the act for laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, consistently with its main design, and with the maintenance of the public faith. The said Secretary respectfully submits the following Report:

From the several petitions and memorials which have been referred to the Secretary, as well as from various representations which have been made to him, it appears that objections have arisen in different quarters against the above-mentioned act, which have, in some instances, embarrassed its execution; and inspired a desire of its being repealed; in others, have induced a wish that alterations may be made in some of its provisions. These objections have reference to a supposed tendency of the act—1st. To contravene the principle of liberty. 2dly. To infringe the rights of the subject. 3dly. To increase the expense of the law.

It has been heretofore noticed that the chief circumstances which, in certain excise laws, have given occasion to the charge of their being unfriendly to liberty, are not to be found in the act which is the subject of the Report, namely : 1st, a summary and discretionary jurisdiction in the excise officers, contrary to the course of the common law; and an abridgement of the right of trial by jury; and, secondly, a general power in the same officers to search and inspect indiscriminately all the houses and buildings of the persons engaged in the business to which the tax relates.

possessor as a place used for distilling or keeping spirits. And even the power to qualified is only applicable to distilleries from foreign materials, and in cities, towns, and villages, from domestic materials; that is, only in cases in which the law contemplates that the business is carried on upon such a scale as effectually to separate the distillery from the dwelling of the distiller. The distilleries scattered over the country, which form much the greatest part of the whole, are in no degree subject to discretionary inspection and search. The true principles of the objection which may be raised to a general discretionary power of inspection and search is, that the domicile or dwelling of a citizen ought to be free from vexatious inquisition and intrusion. This principle cannot apply to a case in which it is put in his own power to separate the place of his business from the place of his habitation, and by designating the former visible public marks, to avoid all interfering with the latter. A distillery seldom forms a part of the dwelling of its proprietor, and even where it does, it depends on him to direct and limit the power of visiting and search, by marking out the particular apartments which are so employed.

But the requisition upon the distiller to set marks on the building or apartments which he makes use of in his business is one of the topics of complaint against the law. Such marks are represented as a dishonorable badge. And thus a regulation designed as much to conform with the feelings of the citizen as for the security of the revenue is converted into matter of objection.

It is not easy to conceive what maxim of liberty is violated by requiring persons who carry on particular trades, which are made contributory to the revenue, to designate by public marks the places in which they are carried on. There can certainly be nothing more harmless or less inconvenient than such a regulation. The thing itself is frequently done by persons of various callings, for the information of customers; and why it should become a hardship or grievance, if required for a public purpose, can with difficulty be imagined.

The supposed tendency of the act to injure morals seems to have relation to the oaths, which are in a variety of cases required, and which are liable to the objection that they give occasion to perjuries. The necessity of requiring oaths is, whenever it occurs, matter of regret. It is certainly desirable to avoid them as often and as far as possible. But it is more easy to desire than to find a substitute. The requiring of them is not peculiar to the act in question. They are a common appendage of revenue laws, and are among the usual guards of those laws, as they are of public and private rights in Courts of Justice. They constantly occur in jury trials, to which the citizens of the United States are so much and so justly attached. The same objection, in different degrees, lies against them in both cases. Yet it is not perceivable how they can be dispensed with in either. It is remarkable that both the kinds of security to the revenue which are to be found in the act, the oaths of parties and the inspection of officers, are objected to. If they are both to be abandoned, it is not easy to imagine what security there can be for any species of revenue which is to be collected from articles of consumption. If precautions of this nature are inconsistent with liberty, and immoral, as there are very few indirect taxes which can be collected without them, the consequence must be, that the entire or almost entire weight of the public burdens must, in the first instance, fall upon fixed and visible property, houses and lands, a consequence which would be found, in experiment, productive of great injustice and inequality, and ruinous to agriculture.

It has been suggested by some distillers that both the topics of complaint which have been mentioned might be obviated by a fixed rate of duty, adjusted according to a ratio compounded of the capacity of each still, and the number and capacities of the cisterns employed with it; but this and every similar method are objected to by other distillers, as tending to great inequality arising from unequal supplies of the material at different times and at different places, from the different methods of distillation practised by different distillers, and from the different degrees of activity in the business which arise from capitals more or less adequate.

The result of an examination of this point appears to be, that every such mode, in cases in which the business is carried on upon an extensive scale, would necessarily be attended with considerable inequalities, and, upon the whole, would be less satisfactory than the plan which has been adopted.

It is proved by the fullest information that, in regard to distilleries which are rated in the law according to the capacity of each still, the alternative of paying according to the quantity actually distilled is viewed in many parts of the United States as essential to the equitable operation of the duty. And it is evident that such an alternative could not be allowed, but upon the condition of the party rendering upon oath an account of the quantity of spirits distilled by him, without entirely defeating the duty.

As to the charge that the penalties of the act are severe and oppressive, it is made in such general terms, and so absolutely without the specification of a single particular, that it is difficult to imagine where it points. The Secretary, however, has carefully reviewed the provisions of the act in this respect, and he is not able to discover any foundation for the charge. The penalties it inflicts are in their nature the same with those which are common in revenue laws, and in their degree comparatively moderate. Pecuniary fines, from fifty to five hundred dollars, and forfeiture of the article in respect to which there has been a failure to comply with the law, are the severest penalties inflicted upon delinquent parties, except in a very few cases. In two, a forfeiture of the value of the article is added to that of the article itself; and, in some others, a forfeiture of the ship or vessel and of the wagon or other instrument of conveyance, assistant in a breach of law, is likewise involved.

Penalties like these for wilful and fraudulent breaches of an important law cannot truly be deemed either unimportant or excessive. They are less than those which secure the laws of impost, and as moderate as can promise security to any object of revenue which is capable of being evaded.

There appears to be but one provision in the law which admits of a question whether the penalty prescribed may not partake of severity. It is that which inflicts the pains of perjury on any person who shall be convicted of "wilfully taking a false oath or affirmation, in any of the cases in which oaths or affirmations are required by the act. Precedents in relation to this particular vary. In many of them the penalties are less severe than for perjury in Courts of Justice; in others they are the same. The latter are generally of the latest date, and seem to have been the result of experience.

The United States have in other cases pursued the same principle as in the law in question; and the practice is certainly founded on strong reasons. 1st. The additional security which it gives to the revenue cannot be doubted. Many who would risk pecuniary forfeitures and penalties would not encounter the more disgraceful punishment annexed to perjury.

2d. There seems to be no solid distinction between one false oath in violation of law and right and another false oath in violation of law and right.

A distinction in the punishments of different species of false swearing is calculated to beget false opinions concerning the sanctity of an oath; and, by countenancing an impression that a violation of it is less heinous in the cases in which it is less punished, it tends to impair in the mind that scrupulous veneration for the obligation of an oath which ought always to prevail, and not only to facilitate a breach of it in the cases which the laws have marked with less odium, but to prepare the mind for committing the crime in other cases.

So far is the law under consideration from being chargeable with particular severity, that there are to be found in it marks of more than common attention to prevent its operating severely or oppressively. The 43d section of the act contains a special provision (and one which it is believed is not to be found in any law enacted in this country prior to the present Constitution of the United States) by which forfeitures and penalties incurred without an intention of fraud or wilful negligence may be mitigated or remitted. This mild and equitable provision is an effectual guard against suffering or inconvenience in consequence of undesigned transgressions of the law.

The 30th section contains a provision in favor of persons who, though innocent, may accidentally suffer by seizures of their property, (as in the execution of the revenue laws sometimes unavoidably happens,) which is perhaps entirely peculiar to the law under consideration. Where there has even been a probable cause of seizure, sufficient to acquit an officer, the jury are to assess whatever damages may have accrued from any injury to the articles seized, with an allowance for the detention of it at the rate of six per centum per annum of the value, which damages are to be paid out of the public Treasury.

There are other provisions of the act which mark the scrupulous attention of the Government to protect the parties concerned from inconvenience and injury, and which conspire to vindicate the law from imputations of severity or oppression.

The supposed tendency of the act to injure industry, and to interfere with the business of distilling, is endeavored to be supported by some general and some special reasons, both having relation to the effect of the duty upon the manufacture. Those of the first kind affirm generally that duties on home manufactures are impolitic, because they tend to discourage them; that they are particularly so when they are laid on articles manufactured from the produce of the country, because they have then the additional effect of injuring agriculture; that it is the general policy of nations to protect and promote their own manufactures, especially those which are wrought out of domestic materials; that the law in question interferes with this policy.

Observations of this kind admit of an easy answer. Duties on manufactures tend to discourage them or not, according to the circumstances under which they are laid, and are impolitic or not, according to the same circumstances. When a manufacture is in its infancy, it is impolitic to tax it; because the tax would be both unproductive and would add to the difficulties which naturally impede the first attempts to establish a new manufacture, so as to endanger its success. But when a manufacture, as in the case of distilled spirits, in the United States, is arrived at maturity, it is as fit an article of taxation as any other. No good reason can be assigned why the consumer of a domestic commodity should not contribute something to the public revenue, when the consumer of a foreign commodity contributes to it largely; and, as a general rule, it is not to be disputed that duties on articles of consumption are paid by the consumers.

To the manufacture itself the duty is no injury, if an equal duty be laid on the rival foreign article. And when a greater duty is laid upon the latter than upon the former, as in the present instance, the difference is a bounty on the domestic article, and operates as an encouragement of the manufacture. The manufacturer can afford to sell his fabric the cheaper, in proportion to that difference, and is so far enabled to undersell and supplant the dealer in the foreign article.

The principle of the objection would tend to confine all taxes to imported articles, and would deprive the Government of resources which are indispensable to a due provision for the public safety and welfare; contrary to the plain intention of the Constitution, which gives express power to employ those resources when necessary: a power which is found in all Governments, and is essential to their efficiency, and even to their existence.

Duties on articles of internal production and manufacture form in every country the principal sources of revenue. Those on imported articles can only be carried to a certain extent, without defeating their object; by operating either as prohibitions, or as bounties upon smuggling. They are moreover in some degree temporary; for as the growth of manufactures diminishes the quantum of duty on imports, the public revenue ceasing to arise from that source, must be derived from articles which the national industry has substituted for those previously imported. If the Government cannot then resort to internal means for the additional supplies, which the exigencies of every nation call for, it will be unable to perform its duty or even to preserve its existence. The community must be unprotected, and the social compact be dissolved.

For the same reasons that a duty ought not to be laid on an article manufactured out of the produce of the country (which is the point most insisted upon) it ought not to be laid upon the produce itself, nor consequently upon the land, which is the instrument of that produce; because taxes are laid upon land as the fund out of which the income of the proprietor is drawn, or, in other words, on account of its produce. There ought, therefore, on the principle of the objection, to be neither taxes on land, nor the produce of land, nor on articles manufactured from that produce. And if a nation should be in a condition to supply itself, with its own manufactures, there could then be very little or no revenue, of course there must be a want of the essential means of national justice and national security.

Positions like these, however well meant by those who urge them, refute themselves, because they tend to the dissolution of Government, by rendering it incapable of providing for the objects for which it is instituted.

However true the allegation that it is and ought to be the prevailing policy of nations to cherish their own manufactures, it is equally true that nations in general lay duties for the purpose of revenue on their own manufactures; and it is obvious to a demonstration that it may be done without injury to them. The most successful nations in manufactures have drawn the largest revenues from the most useful of them. It merits particular attention, that ardent spirits are an article, which has been generally deemed and made use of, as one of the fittest objects of revenue, and to an extent in other countries, which bears no comparison with what has been done in the United States.

The special reasons alluded to are of different kinds:

I. It is said, that the act in question by laying a smaller additional duty on foreign spirits, than the duty on home-made spirits, has a tendency to discourage the manufacture of the latter.

This objection merits consideration, and as far as it may appear to have foundation, ought to be obviated. The point, however, seems not to have been viewed in all its aspects in a correct light. Before the present Constitution of the United States began to operate, the regulations of the different States, respecting distilled spirits were very dissimilar. In some of them duties were laid on foreign spirits only, in others, on domestic as well as foreign. The absolute duty in the former instances, and the difference of duty in the latter, was upon an average, considerably less than the present difference in the duties on foreign and home-made spirits. If to this be added the effect throughout the United States, it is easy to infer that the situation of our own distilleries is in the main much better, as far as they are affected by the laws, than it was previous to the passing of any act of the United States upon the subject. They have, therefore, upon the whole, gained materially under the system which has been pursued by the National Government.

The first law of the United States on this head laid a duty of no more than eight cents per gallon on those of Jamaica proof. The second increased the duty on foreign spirits to twelve cents per gallon of the lowest proof, and by certain gradations to fifteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof. The last act places the duty at twenty cents per gallon of the lowest proof, and extends it by the like gradations, to twenty-five cents per gallon of Jamaica proof, laying also a duty of eleven cents per gallon on home-made spirits distilled from foreign materials of the lowest proof, with a like gradual extension to fifteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof; and a duty of nine cents per gallon on home-made spirits distilled from domestic materials of the lowest proof, with the like gradual extension to thirteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof.

If the transition had been immediate from the first to the last law, it could not have failed to have been considered as a change in favor of our own distilleries, as far as the rate of duty is concerned. The mean duty on foreign spirits by the first law was nine cents, by the last the mean extra duty on foreign spirits is in fact about eleven cents, as it regards spirits distilled from foreign materials, and about thirteen, as it regards spirits distilled from domestic materials. In making this computation it is to be adverted to, that the four first degrees of proof mentioned in the law correspond with the different kinds of spirits usually imported, while the generality of those made in the United States are of the lowest class of proof.

Spirits from domestic materials derived a double advantage from the last law, that is, from the increased rate of duty on foreign imported spirits, and from a higher rate of duty on home-made spirits of foreign materials.

But the intervention of the second law has served to produce in some places a different impression of the business than would have happened without it. By a considerable addition to the duties on foreign spirits, without laying anything on those of home manufacture, it has served to give to the last law the appearance of taking away a part of the advantages previously secured to the domestic distilleries. It seems to have been overlooked, that the second act ought in reality to be reviewed only as an intermediate step to the arrangement finally contemplated by the Legislature; and that, as part of a system, it has upon the whole operated in favor of the national distilleries. The thing to be considered is the substantial existing difference in favor of the home manufacture, as the law now stands.

The advantage, indeed, to the distillation of spirits from the produce of the country arising from the difference between the duties on spirits distilled from foreign and those distilled from domestic materials, is exclusively the work of the last act, and is an advantage which has not been properly appreciated by those distillers of spirits from home produce, who have complained of the law as hurtful to their manufacture.

Causes entirely foreign to the law itself have also assisted in producing misapprehension. The approximation of the price of home-made spirits to that of foreign spirits, which has of late taken place, and which is attributed to the operation of the act in question is in a great degree owing to the circumstances, which have tended to raise the price of molasses in the West India market, and to an extra importation of foreign spirits prior to the first of July last, to avoid the payment of the additional duty which then took place.

It is stated in the petition from Salem, that previous to the last act, the price of domestic to foreign spirits was as 1s. 9d. to 3s. 4d., of the money of Massachusetts, per gallon, and that since that act it has become as 3s. 3d. to 4s. 2d.

It is evident that a rise from 1s. 9d. to 3s. 3d. per gallon, which would be equal to twenty cents, is not to be attributed wholly to a duty of eleven cents. Indeed if there were a concurrence of no other cause, the inference would be very different from that intended to be drawn from the fact, for it would evince a profit gained to the distiller of more than eighty per cent. on the duty.

It is, however, meant to be understood, that this approximation of prices occasions a greater importation and consumption of foreign, and a less consumption of domestic spirits than formerly. How far this may or may not be the case, the Secretary is not now able to say with precision; but no facts have come under his notice officially, which serve to authenticate the suggestion. And it must be considered as possible, that representations of this kind, are rather the effect of apprehension than of experience. It would even be not unnatural, that a considerable enhancement of the prices of the foreign article should have led to a greater consumption of the domestic article, as the cheapest of the two, though dearer itself than formerly.

But while there is ground to believe that the suggestions which have been made on this point, are in many respects inaccurate and misconceived, there are known circumstances, which seem to render advisable, some greater difference between the duties on foreign and on home-made spirits. These circumstances have been noticed in the Report of the Secretary on the subject of manufactures, and an alteration has been proposed by laying two cents in addition upon imported spirits of the lowest proof, with a proportional increase on the higher proofs, and by deducting one cent from the duty on the lowest proof of home-made spirits, with a proportional diminution in respect to the higher proofs.

This alteration would bring the proportion of the duties nearly to the standard, which the petitioner, Hendrick Doyer, who appears likely to be well informed on the subject, represents as the proper one to enable the distillation of Geneva to be carried on with the same advantage as before the passing of the act. He observes that the duty on home-made Geneva being nine cents, the additional duty on foreign ought to have been twelve cents. By the alteration proposed, the proportion will be as ten to eight, which is little different to that of twelve to nine.

It is worthy of remark, that the same petitioner states, that previous to the passing of the act of which he complains, he "could sell his Geneva sixteen and a quarter per cent. under the price of Holland Geneva, but that he cannot do it at present, and in future, lower than fourteen per cent." If, as he also states, the quality of his Geneva be equal to that of Holland, and if his meaning be as it appears to be, that he can now afford to sell his Geneva lower by fourteen per cent. than the Geneva of Holland, it will follow that the manufacture of that article is in a very thriving train, even under the present rate of duties. For a difference of fourteen per cent. in the price is capable of giving a decided preference to the sale of the domestic article.

II. It is objected that the duty, by being laid in the first instance upon the distiller, instead of the consumer, makes a larger capital necessary to carry on the business, and in this country, where capitals are not large, puts the national distiller under disadvantages.

But this inconvenience, as far as it has foundation, in the state of things, is essentially obviated by the credits given. Where the duty is payable upon the quantity distilled, a credit is allowed, which cannot be less than six, and may extend to nine months. Where the duty is charged on the capacity of the still, it is payable half yearly. Sufficient time is, therefore, allowed to raise the duty from the sale of the article, which supercedes the necessity of a greater capital. It is well known, that the article is one usually sold for cash or at a short credit. If these observations are not applicable to distilleries in the interior country, the same may be said in a great degree of the objection itself. The course of the business in that quarter, renders a considerable capital less necessary than elsewhere. The produce of the distiller's own farm, or of the neighboring farms, brought to be distilled upon shares or compensations in the article itself, constitute the chief business of the distilleries in the remote parts of the country. In the comparatively few instances, in which they may be prosecuted as a regular business, upon a large scale, by force of capital, the observations which have been made will substantially apply.

The collection of the duty from the distiller has, on the other hand, several advantages. It contributes to equality, by charging the article in the first stage of its progress, which diffuses the duty among all classes alike. It the better secures the collection of the revenue, by confining the responsibility to a smaller number of persons, and simplifying the process. And it avoids the necessity of so great a number of officers as would be required in a more diffuse system of collection, operating immediately upon purchasers and consumers. Besides, that the latter plan would transfer, whatever inconveniences may be incident to the collection, from a smaller to a greater number of persons.

III. It is alleged that the inspection of the officers is injurious to the business of distilling, by laying open its secrets or mysteries.

Different distillers, there is no doubt, practice in certain respects different methods in the course of their business, and have different degrees of skill. But it may well be doubted whether in a business so old and so much diffused as that of the distillation of spirits, there are at this day secrets of consequence to the possessors.

There will at least be no hazard in taking it for granted, that none such exist in regard to the distillation of rum from molasses or sugar, or of the spirits from grain usually called whiskey, or of brandies from the fruits of this country. The cases in which the allegations are made with most color apply to geneva, and perhaps to certain cordials.

It is probable, that the course of the business might and would always be such, as in fact to involve no inconvenience on this score. But as the contrary is affirmed, and as it is desirable to obviate complaint as far as it can be done, consistently with essential principles and objects, it may not be unadvisable to attempt a remedy.

It is to be presumed, that if any secrets exist, they relate to a primary process, particularly the mixture of the ingredients; this, it is supposable, cannot take a greater time each day, than two hours. If, therefore, the officers of inspection were enjoined to forbear their visits to the part of the distillery commonly made use of for such process, during a space not exceeding two hours in each day to be notified by the distiller, there is ground to conclude that it would obviate the objection.

IV. The regulations for marking of casks and vessels, as well as houses and buildings, also furnish matter of complaint. This complaint, as it regards houses and buildings, has been already adverted to; but there is a light in which it is made that has not yet been taken notice of.

It is said that the requiring the doors of the apartments as well as the outer door of each building to be marked, imposes unnecessary trouble. When it is considered how little trouble or expense attends the execution of this provision, in the first instance, and that the marks once set will endure for a great length of time, the objection to it appears to be without weight.

But the provision, as it relates to the apartments of buildings, has for its immediate object the convenience of the distillers themselves. It is calculated to avoid the very evil of an indiscriminate search of their houses and buildings, by enabling them to designate the particular apartments which are employed for the purposes of their business, and to secure all others from inspection and visitation.

The complaint, as it respects the marking of casks and vessels, has somewhat more foundation. It is represented (and upon careful inquiry appears to be true) that through long-established prejudice, home-made spirits of equal quality with foreign, if known to be home-made, will not command an equal price. This particularly applies to geneva. If the want of a distinction between foreign and home-made spirits were an occasion of fraud upon consumers, by imposing a worse for a better commodity, it would be a reason for continuing it; but as far as such a distinction gives operation to a mere prejudice, favorable to a foreign and injurious to a domestic manufacture, it furnishes a reason for abolishing it.

Though time might be expected to remove the prejudice, the progress of the domestic manufacture, in the interval, might be materially checked. It appears, therefore, expedient to remove this ground of complaint by authorizing the same marks and certificates, both for foreign and for home-made geneva. Perhaps, indeed, it may not be unadvisable to vest somewhere a discretionary power to regulate the forms of certificates, which are to accompany, and the particular marks, which are to be set upon casks and vessels containing spirits, generally, as may be found convenient in practice. Another source of objection with regard to the marking of casks is, that there is a general prohibition against defacing or altering the marks, and a penalty upon doing it, which prevents the using of the same casks more than once, and occasions waste, loss, and embarrassment.

It is conceived, that this prohibition does not extend to the effacing of old marks and placing of new ones by the officers of the revenue, or in their presence and by their authority. But as real inconveniences would attend a contrary construction, and there is some room for question, it appears desirable that all doubt should be removed, by an explicit provision to enable the officer to efface old marks and substitute new ones, when casks have been emptied of their former contents, and are wanted for new use.

V. The requisition to keep an account from day to day of the quantity of spirits distilled is represented both as a hardship and impossible to be complied with. But the Secretary is unable to perceive that it can justly be viewed either in the one or in the other light. The trouble of setting down in the evening the work of the day, in a book prepared for and furnished to the party, must be inconsiderable, and the doing of it would even conduce to accuracy in business.

The idea of impracticability must have arisen from some misconception. It seems to involve a supposition that something is required different from the truth of the fact. Spirits distilled are usually distinguished into high wines, proof spirits, and low wines. It is certainly possible to express each day the quantity of each kind produced, and where one kind is converted into another, to explain it by brief notes, showing in proper columns the results in those kinds of spirits which are ultimately prepared for sale.

A revision is now making of the forms at first transmitted, and it is not doubted that it will be easy to obviate the objection of impracticability. On full reflection the Secretary is of opinion, that the requisition in this respect is a reasonable one, and that it is of importance to the due collection of the revenue, especially in those cases, where, by the alternative allowed in favor of country distilleries, the oath of a party is the only evidence of the quantity produced. It is useful in every such case to give the utmost possible precision to the object which is to be attested.

VI. It is alleged as a hardship, that distillers are held responsible for the duties on spirits which are exported, till certain things difficult to be performed, are done, in order to entitle the exporter to the drawback.

This is a misapprehension. The drawback is at all events to be paid in six months, which is as early as the duty can become payable, and frequently earlier than it does become payable. And the Government relies on the bond of the exporter for a fulfilment of the conditions upon which the drawback is allowed. An explanation to the several collectors of this point, which has taken place since the complaint appeared, will have removed the cause of it. The same explanation will obviate another objection founded on the supposition that the bond of the distiller and that of the exporter are for a like purpose. The latter is merely to secure the landing of the goods in a foreign country, and will often continue depending after every thing relative to duty and drawback has been liquidated and finished.

VII. It is an article of complaint that no drawback is allowed in case of shipwreck when spirits are sent from one port to another in the United States. There does not occur any objection to a provision for making an allowance of that kind, which would tend to alleviate misfortune and give satisfaction.

VIII. The necessity of twenty-four hours' notice, in order to the benefit of drawback on the exportation of spirits, and the prohibition to remove them from a distillery after sun-set, except in the presence of an officer, are represented as embarrassments to business.

The length of notice required appears greater than is necessary. It is not perceived, that any inconvenience could arise, from reducing the time to six hours. But it is not conceived to be necessary or expedient to make an alteration in the last mentioned particular. The prohibition is of real consequence to the security of the revenue. The course of business will readily adapt itself to it, and the presence of an officer in extraordinary cases will afford due accommodation.

IX. It is stated as a hardship, that there is no allowance for leakage and wastage in the case of spirits shipped from one State to another. The law for the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage allows two per cent. for leakage on spirits imported. A similar allowance on home-made spirits at the distillery, does not appear less proper.

X. It is mentioned as a grievance, that distillers are required to give bond with surety for the amount of the duties, and that the sufficiency of the surety is made to depend on the discretion of the chief officer of inspection. The requiring of sureties can be no more a hardship on distillers than on importing merchants, and every other person to whom the public afford a credit. It is a natural consequence of the credit allowed; and a very reasonable condition of the indulgence which, without this precaution, might be imprudent, and injurious to the United States.

The party has his option to avoid it by prompt payment of the duty, and is even entitled to an abatement, which may be considered as a premium if he elects to do so.

As to the second point, if sureties are to be given, there must be some person on the part of the Government to judge of their sufficiency, otherwise the thing itself would be nugatory; and the discretion cannot be vested more conveniently for the party than in the chief officer of inspection for the survey. A view has now been taken of most, if not of all, the objections of a general nature, which have appeared. Some few of a local complexion remain to be attended to.

The representation, signed Edward Cook, chairman, as on behalf of the four most western counties of Pennsylvania, states, that the distance of that part of the country from a market for its produce leads to a necessity of distilling the grain, which is raised, as a principal dependence of its inhabitants; which circumstance and the scarcity of cash combine to render the tax in question unequal, oppressive, and particularly distressing to them.

As to the circumstance of equality, it may safely be affirmed to be impracticable to devise a tax which shall operate with exact equality upon every part of the community. Local and other circumstances will inevitably create disparities more or less great. Taxes on consumable articles have, upon the whole, better pretensions to equality than any other. If some of them fall more heavily on particular parts of the community, others of them are chiefly borne by other parts. And the result is an equalization of the burden as far as it is attainable. Of this class of taxes it is not easy to conceive one which can operate with greater equality than a tax on distilled spirits. There appears to be no article, as far as the information of the Secretary goes, which is an object of more equal consumption throughout the United States.

In particular districts a greater use of cider may occasion a smaller consumption of spirits; but it will not be found on a close examination that it makes a material difference. A greater or less use of ardent spirits, as far as it exists, seems to depend more on relative habits of sobriety or intemperance than on any other cause.

As far as habits of less moderation, in the use of distilled spirits, should produce inequality anywhere, it would certainly not be a reason with the Legislature either to repeal or lessen a tax which, by rendering the article dearer, might tend to restrain too free an indulgence of such habits.

It is certainly not obvious how this tax can operate particularly unequal upon the part of the country in question. As a general rule it is a true one, that duties on articles of consumption fall on the consumers, by being added to the price of the commodity. This is illustrated in the present instance by facts. Previous to the law laying a duty on home-made spirits the price of whiskey was about thirty-eight cents; it is now about fifty-six cents. Other causes may have contributed in some degree to this effect, but it is evidently to be ascribed chiefly to the duty.

Unless, therefore, the inhabitants of the countries, which have been mentioned are greater consumers of spirits, than those of other parts of the country, they cannot pay a greater proportion of the tax. If they are, it is their interest to become less so. It depends on themselves by diminishing the consumption to restore equality.

The argument, that they are obliged to convert their grain into spirits in order to transportation to distant markets, does not prove the point alleged. The duty on all they send to those markets will be paid by the purchasers. They will still pay only upon their own consumption.

As far as an advance is laid upon the duty, or as far as the difference of duty between whiskey and other spirits tend to favor a greater consumption of the latter, they as greater manufacturers of the article, supposing this fact to be as stated, will be proportionably benefited.

The duty on home-made spirits from domestic materials, if paid by the gallon, is nine cents. From the communications which have been received, since the passing of the act, it appears that paying the rate annexed to the capacity of the still, and using great diligence, the duty may be in fact reduced to six cents per gallon. Let the average be taken at seven and a half cents, which is probably higher than is really paid.

Generally speaking, then, for every gallon of whiskey which is consumed, the consumer may be supposed to pay seven and a half cents; but for every gallon of spirits distilled from foreign materials, the consumer pays at least eleven cents, and for every gallon of foreign spirits at least twenty cents. The consumer, therefore, of foreign spirits pays nearly three times the duty, and the consumer of home-made spirits from foreign materials nearly fifty per cent. more duty, on the same quantity, than the consumer of spirits from domestic materials, exclusive of the greater price in both cases, which is an additional charge upon each of the two first mentioned classes of consumers.

When it is considered that 4-21 parts of the whole quantity of spirits consumed in the United States are foreign, and 7-21 parts are of foreign materials, and that the inhabitants of the Atlantic and Midland countries are the principal consumers of these more highly taxed articles, it cannot be inferred that the tax under consideration bears particularly hard on the inhabitants of the Western country.

This may serve as an exemplification of a general proposition of material consequence, namely, that, if the former description of citizens are able from situation to obtain more for their produce than the latter, they contribute proportionally more to the revenue. Numerous other examples in the confirmation of this might be adduced.

As to the circumstance of scarcity of money, as far as it can be supposed to have foundation, it is as much an objection to any other tax as the one in question. The weight of the tax is not certainly such as to involve any peculiar difficulty. It is impossible to conceive that nine cents per gallon on distilled spirits, which is stating it at the highest, can, from the magnitude of the tax, distress any part of the country, which has an ability to pay taxes at all, enjoying too the unexampled advantage of a total exemption from taxes on houses, lands, or stock.

The population of the United States being about four millions of persons, and the quantity of spirits annually consumed between ten and eleven millions of gallons, the yearly proportion to each family, if consisting of six persons, which is a full ratio, would be about sixteen gallons, the duty upon which would be less than one dollar and a half. The citizen who is able to maintain a family, and who is the owner or occupier of a farm, cannot feel any inconvenience from so light a contribution, and the industrious poor, whether artisans or laborers, are usually allowed spirits or an equivalent in addition to their wages.

The Secretary has no evidence to satisfy his mind, that a real scarcity of money will be found, on experiment, a serious impediment to the payment of the tax anywhere. In the quarter where this complaint has particularly prevailed, the expenditures for the defence of the frontier would seem alone sufficient to obviate it. To this it is answered, that the contractors for the supply of the Army operate with goods and not with money.

But this still tends to keep at home whatever money finds its way there. Nor is it a fact, if the information of the Secretary be not materially erroneous, that the purchases of the contractors of flour, meat, &c., are wholly with goods. But if they were, the Secretary can aver, that more money has, in the course of the last year, been sent into the Western country from the Treasury, in specie, and bank bills which answer the same purpose, for the pay of the troops and militia, and for Quartermaster's supplies, than the whole amount of the tax in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania and the district of Kentucky is likely to equal in four or five years. Similar remittances are likely to be made in future.

Hence the Government itself furnishes, and in all probability will continue to furnish, the means of paying its own demands, with a surplus which will sensibly foster the industry of the parties concerned, if they avail themselves of it, under the guidance of a spirit of economy and exertion.

Whether there be no part of the United States, in which the objection of want of money may truly exist, in a degree to render the payment of the duty seriously distressing to the inhabitants, the Secretary is not able to pronounce. He can only express his own doubt, of the fact, and refer the matter to such information as the members of any district so situated, may have it in their power to offer to the Legislative body.

Should the case appear to exist, it would involve the necessity of a measure in the abstract very intelligible, that is, the receipt of the duty in the article itself.

If an alternative of this sort were to be allowed, it would be proper to make it the duty of the party paying, to deliver the article at the place in each county where the office of inspection is kept, and to regulate the price according to such standard, as would induce a preference of paying in cash, except from a real impracticability of obtaining it.

In regard to the petition from the district of Kentucky, after what has been said with reference to other applications, it can only be necessary to observe that the exemption which is sought by that petition, is rendered impracticable by an express provision of the Constitution, which declares, that all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

In the course of the foregoing examination of the objections which have been made to the law, some alterations have been submitted for the purpose of removing a part of them. The Secretary will now proceed to submit such farther alterations as appear to him advisable, arising either from the suggestions of the officers of the revenue, or from his own reflections.

I. It appears expedient to alter the distinction respecting distilleries from domestic materials in cities, towns and villages, so as to confine it to one or more stills worked at the same distillery, the capacity or capacities of which together do not fall short of four hundred gallons.

The effectual execution of the present provisions respecting distilleries from home materials in cities, towns, and villages, would occasion an inconvenient multiplication of officers, and would in too great a degree exhaust the product of the duty in the expense of collection. It is also probable that the alteration suggested would also conduce to public satisfaction.

II. The present provisions concerning the entering of stills are found by experience not to be adequate, and in some instances not convenient.

It appears advisable, that there shall be one office of inspection for each county, with authority to the supervisor to establish more than one, if he shall judge it necessary for the accommodation of the inhabitants; and that every distiller or person having or keeping a still, shall be required to make entry of the same, at some office of inspection for the county, within a certain determinate period in each year. It will be proper also to enjoin upon every person, who, residing within the county, shall procure a still, or who removing into a county, shall bring into it a still, within twenty days after such procuring or removal, and before he or she begins to use the still, to make entry at the office of inspection. Every entry, besides describing the still, should specify in whose possession it is, and the purpose for which it is intended, as whether for sale or for use in distilling; and in the case of a removal of the person from another place into the county, shall specify the place from which the still shall have been brought. A forfeiture of the still ought in every case in which an entry is required, to attend an omission to enter.

This regulation, by simplifying the business of entering stills, would render it easier to comprehend and comply with what is required, would furnish the officers with a better rule for ascertaining delinquencies, and, by avoiding to them a considerable degree of unnecessary trouble, will facilitate the retaining of proper characters in the offices of collectors.

III. It is represented that difficulties have in some instances arisen concerning the persons responsible for the real proprietor, an opportunity for collusion is afforded; and without collusion the uncertainty is stated as a source of embarrassment.

It also sometimes happens, that certain itinerant persons without property, complying with the preliminary requisitions of the law as to entry, &c., erect and work stills for a time, and before a half-yearly period of payment arrives, remove and evade the duty.

It would tend to remedy these inconveniences, if possessors and proprietors of stills were made jointly and severally liable, and if the duty were made a specific lien on the still itself; if also the proprietor of the land, upon which any still may be worked should be made answerable for the duty, except where it is worked by a lawful and bona fide tenant of the land of an estate, not less than for a term of one year, or unless such proprietor can make it appear, that the possessor of the still was during the whole time, without his privity or connivance, an intruder or trespasser on the land; and if, in the last place, any distiller about to remove from the division in which he is, should be required previous to such removal to pay the tax for the year, deducting any prior payments, or give bond with approved surety, conditioned for the payment of the full sum for which he or she should be legally accountable to the end of the year, to the collector of the division to which the removal shall be, rendering proof thereof under the hand of the said collector, within six months after the expiration of the year.

As well with a view to the forfeiture of the stills for non-entry, as to give effect to a specific lien of the duty (if either or both of these provisions should be deemed eligible) it will be necessary to enjoin it upon the officers of the revenue to identify by proper marks the several stills which shall have been entered with them.

IV. The exemptions granted to stills of the capacity of fifty gallons and under, by the 36th section of the law, appear from experience to require as to frustrate the revenue, they have excited complaint. It appears at least advisable, that the obligation to enter, as connected with that of paying duty, should extend to stills of all dimensions, and that it should be enforced in every case by the same penalty.

V. The 28th section of the act makes provision for the seizure of spirits unaccompanied with marks and certificates in the cases in which they are required; but as they are required only in certain cases, and there is no method of distinguishing the spirits, in respect to which they are necessary, from those in respect to which they are not necessary, the provision becomes nugatory, because an attempt to enforce it would be oppressive. Hence not only a great security for the due execution of the law is lost, but seizures very distressing to offending individuals must happen, notwithstanding great precaution to avoid them.

It would be, in the opinion of the Secretary, of great importance to provide, that all spirits whatsoever in casks or vessels of the capacity of twenty gallons and upwards should be marked and certified, on pain of seizure and forfeiture, making it the duty of the officers to furnish the requisite certificates gratis to distillers and dealers in all cases, in which the law shall have been complied with. In those cases in which an occasional recurrence to the officers for certificates might be inconvenient, blanks may be furnished, to be accounted for. And it may be left to the parties themselves, in the like cases, to mark their own casks or vessels, in some simple manner, to be defined in the law. These cases may be designated generally. They will principally relate to dealers, who, in the course of their business, draw off spirits from larger to smaller casks; and to distillers, who pay according to the capacities of their stills.

As a part of a regulation of this sort, it will be necessary to require, that within a certain period, sufficiently long to admit of time to know and comply with the provision, entry shall be made, by all dealers and distillers, of all spirits in their respective possessions, which shall not have been previously marked and certified according to law, in order that they may be marked and certified as old stock.

The regulations here proposed, though productive of some trouble and inconvenience in the outset, will be afterwards a security, both to individuals and to the revenue.

VI. At present spirits may not be imported from abroad in casks of less capacity than fifty gallons. The size of these casks is smaller than is desirable, so far as the security of the revenue is concerned; and there has not occurred any good objection to confining the importation to larger casks, that is to say, to casks of not less than ninety gallons. Certainly, as far as respects rum from the West Indies, it may be done without inconvenience, being conformable to the general course of business. The result of examination is, that the exception as to this particular in favor of rum may be abolished. Should any alteration on this subject take place, it ought not to begin to operate till after the expiration of the year.

VII. There is ground to suppose that the allowance of drawback, without any limitation as to quantity, has been abused. It is submitted, that none be made on any less quantity than one hundred and fifty gallons.

VIII. There is danger that facility may be given to illicit importations, by making use of casks which have been once regularly marked, and the certificates which have been issued with them, to cover other spirits than those originally contained in such casks. Appearances which countenance suspicion on this point, have been the subjects of representation from several quarters.

The danger may be obviated, by prohibiting the importation in such marked casks, on pain of forfeiture both of the spirits and of any ship or vessel in which they may be brought. A prohibition of this sort does not appear liable to any good objection.

IX. The duty of sixty cents per gallon of the capacity of a still, was founded upon a computation that a still, of any given dimensions, worked four months in the year—which is the usual period of country distillation—would yield a quantity of spirits which, at the rate of nine cents per gallon, would correspond with sixty cents per gallon of the capacity of the still. It will deserve consideration, whether it will not be expedient to give an option to country distillers, at the annual entry of their stills, to take out a license for any portion of the year which they may respectively think fit, and to pay at the rate of twelve and a half cents per gallon of the capacity per month, during such period. This to stand in lieu of the alternative of paying by the gallon, distilled. It would obviate in this case the necessity of accounting upon oath, and would leave it in the power of each distiller to cover the precise time he meant to work his still, with a license, and to pay for that time only. A strict prohibition to distil at any other time than that for which the license was given, would be of course necessary to accompany the regulation, as far as regarded any such licensed distiller.

The only remaining points which have occurred, a proper to be submitted to the consideration of the Legislature, respect the officers of the revenue.

It is represented, that in some instances, from the ill humor of individuals, the officers have experienced much embarrassment, in respect to the filling of stills with water, to ascertain their capacity—which, upon examination, is found the most simple and practicable mode. The proprietors have, in some instances, not only refused to aid the officers, but have even put out of their way the means by which the filling might be conveniently accomplished.

It would conduce to the easy execution of the law, and to the very important purpose of retaining and procuring respectable characters as collectors, if the proprietors and possessors of stills were required to aid them in the execution of this part of their duty, or to pay a certain sum as a compensation for the doing of it.

The limits assigned in the law respecting compensations, are found, in practice, essentially inadequate to the object.

This is so far the case, that it becomes the duty of the Secretary to state that greater latitude in this particular is indispensable to the effectual execution of the law.

In the most productive divisions, the commissions of the collectors afford but a moderate compensation. In the greatest part of them, the compensation is glaringly disproportioned to the service; in many of them it falls materially short of the expense of the officer.

It is believed, that in no country whatever has the collection of a similar duty been effected within the limit assigned. Applying in the United States to a single article only, and yielding consequently a less total product than where many articles are comprehended, the expense of collection must of necessity be proportionally greater.

It appears to the Secretary, that seven and a half per cent. of the total product of the duties on distilled spirits, foreign as well as domestic, and not less, will suffice to defray the compensations to officers, and other expenses incidental to the collection of the duty. This is to be understood as supplemental to the present custom-house expenses. It is unnecessary to urge to the House of Representatives, how essential it must be to the execution of the law, in a manner effectual to the purposes of the Government and satisfactory to the community, to secure, by competent though moderate rewards, the diligent services of respectable and trustworthy characters.

All which is humbly submitted.
ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 5, 1792.

REPORT ON THE SINKING FUND.

IN SENATE, NOVEMBER 7, 1791.
The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, respectfully report to the Congress of the United States of America—

That, pursuant to the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," and in conformity to two resolutions agreed upon by them, one on the 15th day of January, and another on the 15th of August last, and severally approved by the President of the United States they have caused purchases of the said Debt to be made, through the agency, respectively, of Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States; William Seton, Cashier of the Bank of New York; Benjamin Lincoln, Collector of the District of Boston and Charlestown; and William Heth, Collector of the District of Bermuda Hundred, to the amount of $352,677 46, for which there have been paid $540,924 14, in specie, as will more particularly appear by the several documents (Nos. 1 to 6) herewith submitted as part of this report, and which specify the places where, the times when, the prices at which, and the persons of whom the said purchases have been made.

That, though the statements of William Seton and Benjamin Lincoln have not yet passed through the forms of settlement, it appears, by the document No. 8, being a certified transcript from the books of the Treasury, that the amount of the stock by them respectively reported to have been purchased has been duly transferred to the said books.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE, November 4, 1791.

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

[Here follow several other statements, comprising the details, which, being voluminous, are omitted.]

ADDITIONAL SUPPLIES FOR 1793.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, March 16, 1793.
In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant directing the said Secretary to report to the House his opinion of the best mode of raising the additional supplies requisite for the ensuing year, respectfully submits the following Report:

The sum which is estimated to be necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States, beyond the provision made by the act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1792, is $675,950 08. The returns which have been received at the Treasury subsequent to the Secretary's Report of the 23d of January last, (among which are those of some principal ports,) afford satisfactory ground of assurance that the quarter ending the last of December was considerably more productive than it was supposed likely to prove; authorizing a reliance that the revenues to the end of the year 1791 will yield a surplus of $150,000, which may be applied in part of the sum of $675,950 08, above stated to be necessary. Provision remains to be made for the residue of this sum, viz: $525,950 08. Three expedients occur to the option of the Government for providing this sum: one, to dispose of the interest to which the United States are entitled in the Bank of the United States. This, at the present market price of Bank stock, would yield a clear gain to the Government much more than adequate to the sum required. Another, to borrow the money, upon an establishment of funds, either merely commensurate with the interest to be paid; or affording a surplus which will discharge the principal by instalments within a short term. The third is, to raise the amount by taxes. The first of these three expedients appears to the Secretary altogether inadvisable. First, it is his present opinion that it will be found, in various respects, permanently the interest of the United States to retain the interest to which they are entitled in the Bank; but, secondly, if this opinion should not be well founded, it would be improvident to dispose of it at the present juncture, since, upon a comprehensive view of the subject, it can hardly admit of a doubt that its future value, at a period not very distant, will be considerably greater than its present, while the Government will enjoy the benefit of whatever dividends shall be declared in the interval; and, thirdly, whether it shall be deemed proper to retain or dispose of this interest as a fund for extinguishing the Public Debt. A necessity of applying it to any different object, if it should be found to exist, would be matter of serious regret. The second expedient would, in the judgment of the Secretary, be preferable to the first; for this, the following reason, if there were no other, is presumed to be conclusive, viz: that the probable increase of the value of the stock may itself be estimated as a considerable, if not a sufficient fund, for the repayment of the sum which might be borrowed. If the measure of a Loan should be thought eligible, it is submitted as most advisable to accompany it with a provision sufficient not only to pay the interest, but to discharge the principal within a short period. This will at least mitigate the inconvenience of making an addition to the Public Debt. But the result of mature reflection is, in the mind of the Secretary, a strong conviction that the last of the three expedients which have been mentioned is to be preferred to either of the other two. Nothing can more interest the national credit and prosperity than a constant and systematic attention to husbanding all the means previously possessed for extinguishing the present Debt, and to avoid, as much as possible, the incurring of any new debt. Necessity alone, therefore, can justify the application of any of the public property, other than the annual revenues, to the current service, to the temporary and casual exigencies of the country, or the contracting of an additional debt, by loans, to provide for those exigencies. Great emergencies, indeed, might exist in which loans would be indispensable. But the occasions which will justify them must be truly of that description. The present is not of such a nature; the sum to be provided is not of magnitude enough to furnish the plea of necessity. Taxes are never welcome to a community; they seldom fail to excite uneasy sensations, more or less extensive. Hence a too strong propensity in the Governments of nations to anticipate and mortgage the resources of posterity, rather than encounter the inconveniences of a present increase of taxes. But this policy, when not dictated by very peculiar circumstances, is of the worst kind. Its obvious tendency is, by enhancing the permanent burdens of the people, to produce lasting distress, and its natural issue is in national bankruptcy. It will be happy if the councils of this country, sanctioned by the voice of an enlightened community, shall be able to pursue a different course. Yielding to this impression, the Secretary proceeds to state, for the consideration of the House, the objects which have occurred to him as most proper to be resorted to for raising the requisite sum by taxes. From the most careful view which he is able to take of all the circumstances that, at the present juncture, naturally enter into consideration, he is led to conclude that the most eligible mode in which the necessary provision can at this time be made is by some additional duties on imported articles. This conclusion is made with reluctance, for reasons which were noticed upon a former occasion, and from the reflection that frequent and unexpected alterations in the rates of duties, on the objects of trade, by inducing uncertainty in mercantile speculations and calculations, are really injurious to commerce and hurtful to the interests of those who carry it on. The stability of the duties to be paid by the merchants is in fact of more consequence to them than their quantum, if within reasonable bounds. It were therefore, much to be wished that so early a resort to new demands on that class of citizens could have been avoided, and especially that they could have been deferred until a general tariff could have been maturely digested upon principles which might with propriety render it essentially stationary. But while there are these motives to regret, there are others of a consoling tendency, some of which indicate that an augmentation of duties, at the present juncture, may have the effect of lessening some public evils and producing some public benefits. It is a pleasing fact, if the information of the Secretary be not very erroneous, that the improved state of the credit of this country enables our merchants to procure the supplies which they import from abroad upon much more cheap and advantageous terms than heretofore—a circumstance which must alleviate to them the pressure of somewhat higher rates of duty, and must contribute, at the same time, to reconcile them to burdens which, being connected with an efficacious discharge of the duty of Government, are of a nature to give solidity and permanency to the advantages they enjoy under it. It is certain, also, that a spirit of manufacturing prevails at this time in a greater degree than it has done at any antecedent period; and, as far as an increase of duties shall tend to second and aid this spirit, they will serve to promote essentially the industry, the wealth, the strength, the independence, and the substantial prosperity of the country. The returns for one year ending with the 30th of September last, (an abstract of which is in preparation, to be communicated to the Legislature,) evince a much increased importation during that year, greater, far, than can be referred to a naturally increasing demand from the progress of population, and announce a probability of a more than proportional increase of consumption, there being no appearance of an extraordinary abundance of goods in the market. If, happily, an extension of the duties shall operate as a restraint upon excessive consumption, it will be a salutary mean of preserving the community from future embarrassment, public and private. But if this should not be the case, it is at least prudent in the Government to extract from it the resources necessary for current exigencies, rather than postpone the burden to a period when that very circumstance may cause it to be more grievously felt. These different considerations unite, with others which will suggest themselves, to induce, in the present state of things, a preference of taxes on imported articles, to any other mode of raising the sum required. It is therefore respectfully submitted that the existing duties on the articles hereafter enumerated be repealed, and that, in place of them, the following be laid, viz:

ARTICLES AD VALOREM.

China wares; looking-glass, window, and other glass, and all manufactures of glass, black quart bottles excepted; muskets; pistols; swords; cutlasses; hangers, and other fire and side arms; starch; hair powder; wafers; and glue—15 per cent. ad valorem.
Cast, slit, and rolled iron, and generally all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of these metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated; cabinet wares; leather, tanned and raw, and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated; medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing; hats, caps, and bonnets, of every sort; gloves and mittens; stockings; millinery, ready made; artificial flower-stocks; feathers, and other ornaments for women's head dresses; fans; dolls, dressed and undressed; toys; buttons of every kind; carpets and carpeting; mats, and floor cloths; sail cloth; sheathing and cartridge paper; all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, liquors, or other preparation or composition, commonly called sweet-scents, odors, perfumes, or cosmetics; all dentifrice, powders, tinctures, preparations, or compositions whatsoever, for the teeth or gums; printed books, except those specially imported for a college, academy, or other public or incorporated seminary of learning or institution, which shall be wholly exempted from duty—10 per cent. ad valorem.
The foregoing duties to be permanently established, and to be appropriated, in the first place to the payment of the interest of the Public Debt; in the second, to such other grants and appropriations as have been heretofore made: and, in the third, to the purposes of the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States. An addition of two and a half per cent. ad valorem to be made to the duty on all goods heretofore rated at five per cent. ad valorem. This addition to be temporary, and accordingly to be so established as that it shall not continue longer than till the present Indian war shall terminate, and the expenses of carrying it on shall have been defrayed, which will of course include the reimbursement of any sums that may have been borrowed by way of anticipation of the product of the duties. It is represented that the present duty on salt operates unequally, from the considerable difference in weight, in proportion to quantity of different kinds of salt, a bushel weighing from about fifty-six to upward of eighty weight. It would have an equalizing effect, if the bushel were defined by weight; and, if fifty-six pounds were taken as the standard, a valuable accession to the revenue would result. This regulation is, therefore, submitted as a resource upon the present occasion, the rate of duty to remain as it is. It will be a part of this arrangement, to extend the credit for the duty on salt to a longer term. It is an article which, from the circumstances of its importation, frequently lies on hand for a considerable time; and, in relation to the fisheries, is usually sold upon a credit of several months.

Some remarks may be proper in regard to the proposed duties. Those on spirits and wines may appear high; they are doubtless considerable; but there are precedents elsewhere of much higher duties on the same articles. And it is certainly in every view justifiable to make a free use of them for the purpose of revenue. Wines, generally speaking, are the luxury of classes of the community who can afford to pay a considerable duty upon them. It has appeared advisable to adhere to the idea of a specific duty, per quantity, on all the species of wines in most common consumption in the country, and those most susceptible of precise designation, as affording greatest certainty to the revenue, and to adopt a general ad valorem rate for other kinds proportioned to the specific duties; this rate is forty per cent. The distinction has proceeded from the difficulty of a precise enumeration of all the other kinds of wine which are and may be imported, and of such an adjustment of specific rates as will bear some reasonable proportion to the value of the article. The present lowest rate of duty on wines amounts to two hundred and three hundred per cent. on the value of certain kinds, which may be considered as equivalent to a prohibition. While, therefore, ideas of proportion will be better conformed to than heretofore, by the proposed arrangement, it is probable that the revenue will be benefited, rather than injured, by a reduction of the duties on low-priced wines. The considerations which render ardent spirits a proper object of high duties have been repeatedly dwelt upon. It may be added, that it is a familiar and a just remark that the peculiarly low price of ardent spirits in this country is a great source of intemperance. To bring the price of the article more nearly to a level with the price of it in other markets, by an increase of duty, while it will contribute to the advancement of the revenue, cannot but prove, in other respects, a public benefit. The rates proposed will be still moderate, compared with examples in other countries; and the article is of a nature to enable the importer, without difficulty, to transfer the duty to the consumer. A discrimination is suggested in respect to duties on spirits distilled from grain. To this there have been two inducements: one, that the difference in the duty is conformable to the difference between the cost of the grain spirits usually imported and that of West India rum; another, that it is, in a particular manner, the interest of the United States to favor the distillation of its own grain in competition with foreign spirits from the same material. In the second division of spirits, the first class of proof is dropped, because none of it comes from the West Indies, and because any other spirits usually imported, which may be of so low a proof, are higher priced even than some of the higher proofs of West India spirits. The dropping of that class of proof, therefore, in this case is favorable to the revenue and favorable to equality. Several of the other specific duties which are proposed, besides the inducements to them as items of revenue, are strongly recommended by considerations which have been stated in the Report of the Secretary on the subject of manufactures. The same report states inducements to a fifteen per cent. duty on some of the articles which are mentioned as proper to be comprised under that rate. With regard to china and glass, there are two weighty reasons for a comparatively high duty upon them. The use of them is very limited, except by the wealthier classes; and both their bulk and liability to damage in transportation are great securities against evasions of the revenue. It will, however, merit consideration whether, for the accommodation of importers, a longer term of credit ought not to be allowed on these articles. A duty of two cents per pound on cocoa is less, in proportion to the value, than the present duty on coffee; as an extensive article of consumption, it is a productive one of revenue. The duty on playing cards can give rise to no question except as to practicability of a safe collection. In order to this, it will be proper to superadd certain precautions, which will readily occur in regulating the details of a bill for the purpose. A similar attention will be requisite in regard to the duties on wines. The employment of marks and certificates may advantageously be extended to this article. The rate of ten per cent. ad valorem, it is hoped will not be deemed immoderate in relation to the articles to which it is proposed to apply it. It is difficult to assign rules for what ought to be considered as a just standard. But, after the best consideration which the Secretary has been able to bestow upon it, he cannot discover that any real inconvenience is likely permanently to result from the extension of that rate to the cases proposed. The addition of two and a half per cent. to the duty on the mass of articles now rated at five will constitute an important, though not an excessive augmentation. Nevertheless, it is proposed that it shall be only temporary; and there is reasonable ground of expectation that the cause for having recourse to it will not be of very long continuance. It will not have escaped the observation of the House that the duties which were suggested in the Secretary's report on that subject, as encouragements to manufactures, are for the most part included among the objects of this report. It may tend to avoid future embarrassment if such abolitions and drawbacks as shall be deemed expedient, with a view to promoting manufactures, shall accompany the establishment and appropriation of whatever further duties may be laid for the object in contemplation. And it may be found convenient to qualify the appropriation of the surplus which is to be applied to that object, so as to let in such other appropriations during the session as occurrences may suggest. An estimate of the additional revenue which may be expected from the proposed duties is subjoined. It will occur to the House that the credit allowed for the duties will require an anticipation of their product by a temporary loan, for which provision in the law will be requisite. All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Estimate of probable additional revenue from the proposed duties.

Madeira wine, 300,000 gallons, average increase 12 cents per gallon	$36,000
Other wines, 700,000 gallons, average increase 3 cents per gallon	21,000
Distilled spirits, 3,600,000 gallons, average increase, allowing for proposed deduction from the duties on domestic spirits, 2 cents	72,000
Salt, from the equalizing regulation proposed, will probably yield one-sixth more, or 2 cts. per bushel, on 2,000,000 bushels	40,000
Malt liquors, 200,000 gallons, at 2 1-2 cts.	5,000
Nails and spikes, 1,800,000 lbs., at 1 cent	18,000
Cocoa, 800,000 lbs., at 1 cent	8,000
Playing cards, 20,000, at 15 cents	3,000
Other enumerated articles ad valorem, at 15 per cent.	10,000
Increased duty on articles rated permanently at 10 per cent. ad valorem, computed at $2,000,000 in value, at 3 per cent.	60,000
Temporary addition of 2 1-2 per cent. on the articles now rated at 5, computed on $10,000,000	250,000

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

Mr. Fitzsimmons, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, reported that the committee had proceeded to examine all the papers furnished by the Executive Department relative thereto, sundry papers and accounts furnished by the Treasury and War Departments, with explanations of the same by the Heads of those Departments in person, to bear the testimony of witnesses upon oath, and written remarks by General St. Clair, upon the facts established by the whole evidence; and that, as the result of their inquiries, the committee had agreed to the following Report:

The contract for the supplies of the Army on the route from Fort Pitt, was made by Theodosius Fowler, with the Secretary of the Treasury, and bears date the 28th day of October, 1790; that, at the same time, a bond, in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with Walter Livingston and John Cochran securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract; that on the 3d day of January, 1791, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; that, by Letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the 25th of February, 1791, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as the contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments; that on the 6th day of March, 1791, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary of War for supplying the troops with provisions until their arrival at Fort Pitt; and at Fort Pitt a bond was at the same time entered into by the said William Duer for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatsoever; that the act making provision for the defence of the frontiers received the signature of the President of the United States the 3d of March, 1791; that General St. Clair was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army destined for the expedition on the 4th day of the same month, and on the 28th left Philadelphia, for Fort Pitt, at which place he arrived the 16th day of April, and from thence proceeded to Lexington, and from thence to Fort Washington, where he arrived on the 15th day of May. At the time of the arrival of the General at Fort Washington, the garrison there consisted of 75 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; the garrison at Fort Harmer, of 45; at Fort Steuben, of 61; at Fort Knox, of 83; and on the 15th day of July, the whole of the first United States regiment, amounting to 299 non-commissioned officers and privates, arrived at Fort Washington, under orders from the Commander-in-Chief. General Butler was appointed the second in command in the month of March, and immediately proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the recruiting service; that he arrived in Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, the 20th of April, and continued there till the 30th of the same month; that he arrived at Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 9th of May; and at Fort Pitt on the 22d of the same month. It appears that no moneys for purchasing supplies were furnished at Carlisle, which was the place of rendezvous for the enlisted soldiery, on the 9th of May; and that Mr. Smith, agent for the contractor, was actively engaged in furnishing supplies for the troops, on credit.

It appears, by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on the 8th of May; and it appears that on the 23d of March, there was advanced to William Duer, upon the last-mentioned contract, from the Treasury, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars; that there was advanced upon the first-mentioned contract, the sum of seventy thousand dollars, in the following sums, and at the following dates, to wit: March 22, ten thousand dollars; April 7, fifteen thousand dollars; April 25, fifteen thousand dollars; May 7, twenty thousand dollars; July 20, ten thousand dollars.

It appears from the correspondence of General Butler to the Secretary of War, from the 9th of May to the 9th of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Military Stores Department, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp-kettles, cartridge boxes, pack-saddles, &c., all of which articles were deficient in quantity, and bad in quality; the pack-saddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use; the arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use: which circumstances rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt.

It appears that a great proportion of the powder supplied for the use of the Army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson, at Fort Pitt, with a howitz, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder. On the 9th of June, General Neville, another of the contractor's agents, informed General Butler that he had not at that time received any moneys from the contractors for the purchase of provisions, &c. for the troops, and was obliged to supply them on credit; that the country furnished provisions in abundance at a cheap rate when money was had for the purchase; that shortly after this information was communicated to General Butler, at his request four hundred dollars were advanced to General Neville by the Quartermaster, for the purchase of provisions for the troops. The troops arrived at Fort Pitt in the following order, to wit: May 16, Captain Slough, 69 men; May 18, Captain Powers, 78 men; May 19, Captain Cribbs, 40 men; same day, Captain Guthrie, 23 men; May 25, Captain Armstrong, 76 men; same day, Captain Kirkwood, 67 men; May 28, Captain Snowden, 101 men; June 2, Captain Sparks, 83 men; June 3, Captain Butler, 61 men; same day, Captain Brock, 82 men; same day, Captain Van Swearingen, 88 men; June 5, Captain Pike, 73 men; total, including officers and privates, 842 men; and left that place in the following order: Major Ferguson, with Captain Armstrong's company, about the 1st of June; Captain Snowden, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with about 500 men, 12th of July; and on the 22d of August, the last of the troops, under the command of Captain Phelon, and General Butler, with the Quartermaster General, on the 26th of August.

It appears that General Butler had orders from the Department of War to protect the frontiers with the troops under his command; and that the delays in sending forward the troops from Fort Pitt, arose partly from that circumstance, and partly from the temporary want of supplies of provisions and other necessaries, and from the want of the necessary boats for their transportation, which were not in readiness as soon as the troops were. It appears that General Butler acted with ability, activity, and zeal, in his command at Fort Pitt, and that the delays of the troops there cannot be imputed to his want of judgment or his want of exertion. The troops met with considerable difficulties and delays in going down the river, from the low state of the water, and arrived at Fort Washington in the following order: Captain Munford, from North Carolina, with about 50 men, on the — day of —; Major Ferguson, with Captain Armstrong's company, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Colonel Darke, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; and the Kentucky militia, on the — day of —.

The Army, consisting of about 2,000 non-commissioned officers and privates, moved from Fort Washington, by orders from the Commander-in-Chief, to a place about five or six miles from thence, called Ludlow's Station, where they continued till the 17th day of September; at which time, the whole Army amounted to about 2,300 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; that the price of rations at Fort Washington, agreeably to contract, was 63-90ths of a dollar per ration; the price of rations at Ludlow's Station was 154-90ths of a dollar per ration; that the inducements of the Commander-in-Chief to this movement appear to have been, to furnish green forage for the horses and beef cattle for the Army, to instruct the soldiery in field exercise and other necessary discipline, and to deprive them of the means of intoxication, which were very plentifully supplied at Fort Washington, and used to an excessive degree by the soldiery, to correct the excessive use of which the most rigid attention to discipline was found incompetent.

Mr. Hodgdon was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the 4th of June; he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived the 10th of the same month. No sufficient causes have appeared to the committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the Army appears to have been essentially necessary previously to that time; the duties of the Commander-in-Chief were much increased in consequence of the absence of the Quartermaster General, and after a continued expectation of his arrival at Fort Washington, for more than six weeks, the Commander-in-Chief gave him express orders, by letter, to repair to camp without delay. The receipt of the letter is acknowledged, but the orders contained therein were neither answered nor obeyed, and his arrival at camp was not until the tenth of September. The Commander-in-Chief, until that time, in addition to the duties of his office, discharged those of the Quartermaster General; and the military stores furnished by that Department were so deficient, from mismanagement and neglect, that many things essential to the movements of the Army, were either wholly made or repaired at Fort Washington, and even the tools for the artificers to work with, the Quartermaster particularly informed the Commander-in-Chief, that two complete traveling forges were sent forward, and upon examination, both of them were found to be without an anvil. Many other things, equally necessary, were either wholly omitted, or unfit for their intended use.

There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms at Fort Washington, the first of June, and most of them totally out of repair. The Commander-in-Chief appears to have been correct and attentive in all his communications with the Secretary of War, and to have discharged the various duties which devolved upon him with ability, activity, and zeal.

The Army moved from Ludlow's Station, on the seventeenth day of September, and arrived at the place where Fort Hamilton is now erected on the — day of —; they employed about fifteen days building that fort, and then proceeded on their march to the place where Fort Jefferson is now erected, forty-four miles distant from Fort Hamilton, where they arrived on the — day of October, and commenced their march from that place on the twenty-fourth of the same month; that the Army at this time consisted of — non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty. At this time the Army had not more than three days supply of flour, and were sometimes at one-fourth, and sometimes at one-half allowance of that article, the deficiencies of which allowance were made up by increasing the quantity of beef, with which they were plentifully supplied. The Army was delayed five or six days on the march from Fort Jefferson for the want of provisions, and the season was so far advanced that sufficient green forage for the horses, could not be procured, from which circumstance many of the horses were totally lost, and others rendered unfit for service.

The orders to the Commander-in-Chief to proceed with the expedition, were express, and unequivocal, so much so, as in the opinion of the Committee, to preclude the Commander-in-Chief from exercising any discretion relatively to that object

On the 31st of October, about sixty of the Kentucky militia deserted in a body, the first regiment consisting of about three hundred effective men, was detached with a view to cover a convoy of provisions which was expected, and which it was supposed was in danger from the deserted militia and to prevent further desertions. On the 3d of November, after detaching the first regiment, the Army consisted of about fourteen hundred effective men, and on the morning of the 4th, about half an hour after sunrise, a general attack was commenced and in a few minutes thereafter nearly the whole Army was surrounded by the enemy; the action continued about four hours during which several charges were made by part of the Army, which caused the enemy to give way, but produced no good effect; the attack was unexpected, the troops having been just dismissed from the morning parade; it commenced upon the militia who were in advance of the main Army, and who fled through the main Army, without firing a gun; this circumstance threw the troops into some disorder, which, it appears, they never completely recovered during the action; the fire of the Army was constant, but not well directed; and it appears that a part of the troops behaved as well as could be expected from their state of discipline, and the manner and suddenness of the attack. The Commander-in-Chief appears to have been cool and deliberate in the whole of the action, and the officers in general active and intrepid. The whole order of march, as far as the Committee are capable of expressing an opinion, appears to have been judicious, and the ground for action well chosen. The retreat was disorderly in the extreme; after it commenced, no orders were obeyed, if any were given, the men having lost all regard to discipline, or control; all the precaution appears to have been taken for the safety and comfort of the wounded, which the circumstances of the case would admit of.

The Committee have had no competent evidence before them to ascertain the number of the enemy in action; there were various conjectures as to the number, from different persons, from five hundred the lowest to one thousand or twelve hundred the highest.

Mr. Barton, a witness examined by the Committee, conversed with a chief at Niagara who was in the action, and was by him informed that the number of the enemy in action was one thousand and forty, and that six hundred more had convened, but were engaged in hunting, at the time of the action. He was also informed that the enemy had not collected in any considerable numbers until a few days before the action; this information appears to be corroborated by some other circumstances sufficient to induce a belief of the fact in the Committee.

The contractor for supplies, agreeably to the terms of contract, was to furnish horses, &c., for the transportation of the supplies; in this condition of the contract there was a total failure, which compelled the Commander-in-Chief to direct between six and seven hundred horses to be purchased by Israel Ludlow, one of the contractor's agents; to draw bills on Mr. Duier, the acting contractor, for payment, which bills endorsed by the Commander-in-Chief, to the amount of about seventeen thousand dollars, were protested by the contractor and paid at the Treasury. The persons employed by the agents of the contractor to drive the horses, appear to have been totally unacquainted with that business, and from the want of bells, hoppers, and other necessities of that kind, as well as from other gross mismanagement, many of the horses were lost, and others rendered unfit for service; from which causes there were not pack-horses sufficient to transport the necessary quantity of flour from Fort Washington, for the use of the Army on their march; this circumstance retarded the execution of the expedition.

The officers, agreeably to the terms of contract, had an election of drawing the whole of the rations to which their rank entitled them, or of receiving the contract price of them in cash; the contractor's agents not being furnished with money for this purpose, gave rise to a general order by which the officers were directed to receive a certificate from the contractor's agent, called a due bill, of one of which bills the following is a copy:

"Due Major H. Gaither one hundred and seventy-three complete rations, on the route to Miami village, as appears from Mr. Wilson's certificate."

"FORT WASHINGTON, November 27, 1790."
MATT. EARNEST,
for WIL. DUER.

This due bill issued upon the officer's signing some acknowledgments of satisfaction for his whole retained rations, which acknowledgment of satisfaction forms a voucher for settlement to the contractor, with the Treasury Department; and the officer is refused payment for these due-bills at the Pay Office. All casualties, by which these evidences of debt become lost or destroyed, are the gain of the contractor and the loss of the officer.

It is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, though not with positive certainty that a sufficient sum will be found due from the Treasury to the contractors upon a final settlement, to cover all these debts to the officers; the general order, which had the operation before stated, continued in force about five or six weeks, and was abolished about the 19th of October. The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without further pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service and bearing endorsements that some advancements had been made to them in account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations; the real sums due on the notes were various, from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for five dollars, or one gallon of whiskey; the moneys for the pay of the levies, did not leave Philadelphia till 4th December, nor arrive at Fort Washington till 3d of January, 1792. Some time after the last enlisted levies were known to be entitled to their discharges; two reasons were assigned by the Secretary of War for this delay of payment, the one because there was no regular Paymaster in the Army and the difficulties of transmitting moneys to the Army at so great a distance, in consequence of the want of such an officer; the other because it was supposed the Army would be at that time at the Miami village, so far advanced in the wilderness as not to admit of the practicability of discharging the levies, the total defeat of the Army not having been previously counted upon.

The clothing for the levies appears to have been of a very inferior quality, particularly coats, hats, and shoes, the last of which, in many cases, lasted not more than four days, and better clothing was furnished upon their enlisting into the regular service, which was for a time countenanced by the Commander-in-Chief.

Various modes appear to have been pursued by the officers in enlisting the levies, which occasion great uneasiness and some confusion; a considerable part of the Virginia battalion was so enlisted that the terms of their enlistments appear to have expired the first of November; the orders to the recruiting officers appear not to have been sufficiently explicit upon this point, whether the terms of enlistment were to commence at the time of enlistment, or at the arrival at a place of rendezvous. The militia were principally substitutes, and totally ungovernable, and regardless of military duty or subordination. It appears that the Commander-in-Chief had it in contemplation to commence the expedition at least one month earlier than it was commenced, with the few he then had, which was not very different from the real force in action; but was prevented for the want of the Quartermaster and contractor, and in consequence of the extreme deficiencies and derangement of the business of their Departments, the person sent forward by the Quartermaster being totally incompetent to the business; and the contractor's agents not being sufficiently supplied with money to enable them to execute their duties.

It appears to the Committee that in the wilderness where vegetables are not to be had, and the duties of the soldier uncommonly hard, the rations allowed by law, if completely supplied, are insufficient. This circumstance, with others, produced discontent and desertion among the soldiers.

It appears to the Committee that there were appropriated for the use of the War Department, for the year 1791, the sum of $652,761 61, and that there have been advanced by the Treasury to the War Department, upon that appropriation, $575,906 57, to wit:

And that the Treasury has always been in readiness to make the requisite advances, upon the request of the Secretary of War. It does not appear to the Committee in what manner and to what amount these advancements have been disbursed, the accounts not having been yet settled at the Treasury; nor was it possible, from the nature of the case, that they could at this time have received any conclusive or satisfactory information on that point.

From the foregoing state of facts, the Committee suggest the following as the principal causes, in their opinion, of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

The delay in furnishing the materials for, and in passing the act for the protection of the frontiers, the time after the passing of which was hardly sufficient to complete and discipline an Army for such an expedition, during the summer months of the same year.

The delays consequent upon the gross and various mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Contractor's Departments, the lateness of the season at which the expedition was undertaken, the green forage having been previously destroyed by the frost, so that a sufficiency of subsistence for the horses necessary for the Army could not be procured.

The want of discipline and experience in the troops.

The Committee conceive it but justice to the Commander-in-Chief, to say, that in their opinion, the failure of the late expedition can in no respect be imputed to his conduct, either at any time before or during the action; but that as his conduct in all the preparatory arrangements, was marked with peculiar ability and zeal, so his conduct during the action furnished strong testimonies of his coolness and intrepidity.

The Committee suggest, as reasons for leaving the numbers of the troops at particular periods, and the dates of some facts, blank, the want of sufficient time to complete the Report with minuteness, and in some instances the want of the necessary evidence.

The said Report being read,
Resolved, That this House will, early in the next session, proceed to take the same into consideration.

COURT OF INQUIRY ON GEN. HARMAR.

Proceedings of a Court of Inquiry, held at the special request of Brigadier General Josiah HARMAR, to investigate his conduct as Commanding Officer of the Expedition against the Miami Indians, 1790, the same having been transmitted by Major General St. CLAIR to the Secretary of the United States for the Department of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, September 24, 1791.
SIR: I have the honor to enclose to your Excellency the Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry which sat, agreeably to the General Order of the 14th instant, "to inquire into the personal conduct of Brigadier General HARMAR, Commanding Officer on the late expedition against the Miami Indians."

The Court have taken the utmost pains to investigate the subjects committed to them, and have expected that some persons would have attended from Kentucky on the occasion; as mentioned in your Excellency's Letter of the 15th. Finding no personal evidence come forward from that quarter, this day closed their proceedings, and present to your Excellency their opinion, as specially directed.

There are some depositions handed in, but as they are not authenticated under the seal of any Court of Record, or by the Prothonotary of any county, the Court conceive they can only subjoin them to the proceedings for information to your Excellency, as they have been to the Court. They are numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant.

RICHARD BUTLER,

Major General, President.
His Excellency Maj. Gen. ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Proceedings of a Court of Inquiry held at Fort Washington, September 15, 1791, agreeably to the Order of the 14th instant, of which the following is a copy:

"A Court of Inquiry, of which Major General BUTLER is appointed President, and Lieutenant Colonels GIBSON and DARKE members, will sit to-morrow at 12 o'clock, at the southeast block-house, Fort Washington."

Major General RICHARD BUTLER, President.
Lieutenant Colonels GEORGE GIBSON, and WILLIAM DARKE, Members.

After Orders.

HEADQUARTERS, September 14.

Lieutenant WARREN, of the Second United States Regiment, is appointed to record the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry directed to sit at Fort Washington by the orders of this day.

W. SARGENT, Adjutant General.

The Court met, agreeably to the above order, and were duly sworn according to law.

The following Letter was read from his Excellency Major General St. Clair, directed to Major General Butler, President of the Court of Inquiry:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 15, 1791.

SIR: The Court of which you are appointed President is ordered for the purpose of inquiring Question first by the Court. What were your reasons for thinking punishment for neglect of duty out of the question?

Answer. The state of the Army being such that it obliged the General not to do anything that would tend to irritate the militia.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the organization of the Army was a judicious one; such, alone, as was well calculated for the security of the troops?

Answer. It is my opinion that it was the most judicious organization that could be made, and calculated for the interest of the United States.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the order of encampment was a judicious one, and that the extreme parts were so disposed as were calculated to give security to the Army and its appendages?

Answer. I think no better disposition could have been made.

Question by the Court. Do you think the order of battle calculated so as to have been easy of execution and easily formed?

Answer. I think it was the best that could have been formed, and well calculated for covering the appendages of the Army.

Question by the Court. Do you know the General's motives for making the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October?

Answer. I do not know the General's motives for making the detachment of the 14th, but I suppose it was for the purpose of surprising the Maumee village, as we had taken an Indian the day before, who gave us information that the Indians were in great confusion there, and that they were not in force, and very much divided in their councils. We expected to surprise them before they separated.

Question by the Court. What were the movements of the Army after that detachment was made?

Answer. We continued our march next day until an express arrived to inform us that the Indians had evacuated the village, when we halted.

Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body and the detachment?

Answer. About four miles.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the Army was within supporting distance when the detachment was made?

Answer. On the first day we were.

Question by the Court. Do you know what induced the General to make the detachment of the 19th?

Answer. The day preceding that on which the detachment was made, Indian dogs, and cattle came into our camp, which led us to believe the Indians were near us, more especially as they had left their village in such haste. I suppose it was for the purpose of examining the country around the camp. A detachment of three hundred men, under the command of Colonel Trotter, with three days' provision, was made on the 18th, with orders to continue out three days, but which, nevertheless, returned into camp the same evening. The General appeared displeased at their disobedience of orders. Colonel Hardin, wishing to retrieve the character of the militia, asked the General's permission to take out the same detachment on the 19th, which was granted.

Question by the Court. What motives led Colonel Hardin at such a distance as fifteen miles from camp?

Answer. I understood that he got on the trails of the Indians, and that he had discovered an Indian on horseback about one mile from where he fell in with their main body.

Question by the Court. Upon hearing of the defeat of that detachment, did you understand that the General ordered any support?

Answer. I don't know that he did; the first intelligence of the defeat was brought us by those who were defeated, late in the evening.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for the detachment of the 21st, either from the General himself, or any of his confidential officers?

Answer. I do not know from the General; but it was my opinion, as well as that of other officers, that the defeat of the 19th had so panic-struck the Army, that had the Indians attacked on the retreat it might have been lost, which induced the General to send the detachment in the rear.

Question by the Court. Had the General ordered another detachment upon the ground where the defeat of the 19th happened, do you think the militia would have gone, or would they have continued?

Answer. I am rather inclined to think they would not have gone.

Question by the Court. With respect to the general conduct of General Harmar, in the course of the campaign, is it your opinion that it was judicious, and in every respect commendable?

Answer. I do think it was perfectly so; I have the greatest confidence in, and good opinion of, his military abilities.

Captain Strong being sworn, deposed: That he knew of no circumstance during the whole campaign that could in his opinion affect the military character of the General; that the organization of the Army appeared to his judgment extremely judicious, and such he believed was the general opinion of the officers; that the order of the march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, or perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that he had reason to believe that those detachments were not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders in each case that was not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. So far as you are a judge of the organization of the Army, do you think it was proper and judicious?

Answer. So far as I could judge, I think it was extremely judicious.

Question by the Court. Had you any conversation with the officers of the Army on the subject of the organization of the Army?

Answer. I had; and with those who I think were judges, who thought it to be very good.

Question by the Court. Did the arrangement of march appear to be so connected as to be able to support each other in case of attack?

Answer. With respect to support in the action of the 21st, was there any support ordered that you know of?

Answer. I was present when the order was given to Major Ray to move with his battalion to support Major Wyllys.

Question by the Court. Do you know what distance they marched for that purpose, or how long they were gone from the Army?

Answer. I do not recollect perfectly how long, but I think it was not long.

Question by General Harmar. Is it your opinion that the making the detachment under Major Wyllys was attended with good consequences to the Army, or not?

Answer. I think it was attended with useful consequences to the Army.

The Court then adjourned to 3 o'clock, P. M.

THREE O'CLOCK, P. M.

The Court met agreeably to adjournment. Lieutenant Hartshorn was sworn, and deposed:

That he knew of no circumstance during the whole campaign that could, in his opinion, affect the military conduct of the General; that the organization of the Army appeared to his judgment extremely judicious, and such he believed, was the general opinion of the officers; that the order of march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all its parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, and perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that, as to the question of support, he had reason to believe the detachment was not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders in each case that was not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. Do you know, sir, in the course of the campaign, from the time the Army left Fort Washington until its return to that place, any circumstance that could militate against the military character of the General?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. Do you know of any unnecessary delays?

Answer. None at all; far from it; every thing was done to get forward the Army.

Question by the Court. Does any instance of ineptitude in the General come within your knowledge, during the course of the campaign?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. So far as you are a judge of the organization of the Army, do you think it was proper and judicious?

Answer. So far as I could judge, I think it was extremely judicious.

Question by the Court. Had you any conversation with the officers of the Army on the subject of the organization of the Army?

Answer. I had; and with those who I think were judges, who thought it to be very good.

Question by the Court. Did the arrangement of march appear to be so connected as to be able to support each other in case of attack?

Answer. With respect to support in the action of the 21st, was there any support ordered that you know of?

Answer. I think it did, and seemed no less judicious and military in all parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, or perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that he had reason to believe that those detachments were not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders in each case that were not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. With respect to support in the action of the 21st, was there any support ordered that you know of?

Answer. I think it did, and seemed no less judicious and military in all its parts.

Question by the Court. Did the extreme parts of the encampment appear to be so formed as to be competent to cover the main body of the Army in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. Perfectly so.

Question by the Court. Was you in the first engagement of the Army?

Answer. I was in the action of the 19th of October.

Question by the Court. Was you in the detachment of the 14th?

Answer. I was not.

Question by the Court. Did the order of battle, on the 19th, appear to you to be a judicious one?

Answer. I think it was not a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Who was the officer who commanded the troops in that action?

Answer. Colonel Hardin.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you attack the enemy; was it in columns, or did you display in any regular order?

Answer. We were attacked in front of columns.

Question by the Court. When you were attacked, were you ordered to display, or form in any regular order?

Answer. No.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you oppose the enemy when you were attacked?

Answer. By endeavoring to form the line to charge them.

Question by the Court. What troops came within your notice that attempted to form when charged?

Answer. Not more than thirty Federal troops and ten militia.

Question by the Court. How many militia had you?

Answer. I don't know.

Question by the Court. What became of the rest of the militia?

Answer. They gave way and ran.

Question. Do you think that if the militia in that action had been properly formed, and in time, that they would have been sufficient to have beat the enemy?

Answer. They were.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment on the 14th?

Answer. It was supposed for the purpose of gaining the Maumee village before the Indians left it, as we were informed they were preparing to leave it.

Question by the Court. Is that your own opinion?

Answer. It is, and was the general opinion in camp.

Question by the Court. What was the result of the action of the 19th; were the Continental troops and the ten militia defeated?

Answer. They were cut to pieces, except six or seven.

Question by the Court. Do you know from headquarters, or from any principal officers of the Army, what were the motives for making the detachment of the 19th?

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Answer. It was for the purpose of overtaking a party of Indians, whose trails had been discovered. Question by the Court. Was there any attempt made to support that detachment from the main body?

Answer. Not that I know of. Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body of the Army and the detachment attacked?

Answer. Fourteen or fifteen miles. Question by the Court. From the conduct of the militia, do you think that the General had a right to expect any great support from them, if he had been attacked?

Answer. I don't think he had. Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 21st?

Answer. I was not. Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment of the 21st?

Answer. It was for the purpose of seeing if any Indians were in the village.

Question by General Harmar. Did you not think that the detachment sent back under Major Wylls competent to engage any body of the enemy?

Answer. It was sufficient for any body of Indians in that country.

Question by General Harmar. To what cause was it owing that the detachment did not succeed so perfectly as I could have wished for?

Answer. Because they did not obey your orders, they did not march at the time they were directed.

Question by General Harmar. Upon the first intelligence, do you recollect any support I ordered?

Answer. I recollect you ordered a battalion, I think under Major Ray.

Ensign Morgan being sworn, deposed as follows: That, as he did not join the Army under the command of General Harmar until the 13th October, he was unacquainted with its progress until that time, when the Army appeared in good order; as he was an Ensign, and carried the standard every fourth or fifth day after his joining the Army, he was frequently near the General, and always observed, as far as he could judge, the greatest propriety of conduct; as to the organization of the Army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, they are perfectly explained in the general orders; as to the motives which influenced the General in sending out the different detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st, he was unacquainted; the opinion he took up concerning the one of the 14th, was, that the General finding the Army discovered, resolved to make a push for the towns before they were abandoned, and, as he could not do it with his whole Army, formed the detachment on the 14th under Colonel Hardin; the motive for the detachment of the 19th, he was utterly unacquainted with; that of the 21st, as he supposed, was to pick up any straggling Indians who might have come to the towns, to see what they had been about, but without an idea of the Indians being in force.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the party of militia that were attached to Major Wylls' detachment was sufficient to have defeated the Indians if they had done their duty? Answer. If they had been together, I think they were.

Question by the Court. What time did you return to the Army from the action of the 21st? Answer. About 5 o'clock, P. M.; the action commenced soon after day-light.

Question by the Court. Did you see anything of the detachment under Major Ray on your return?

Answer. I saw only a party three miles from the camp, under Captain Craig, that were going to our support.

Question by the Court. What was the disposition of the militia after they returned to the Army; were they well affected to the service and orderly?

Answer. I think they were very disorderly, and very inattentive to their duty, and some appearances of mutiny among them, with both officers and men, and turned out upon one occasion, particularly, to oppose a punishment that had been ordered by the General.

Question by the Court. Do you remember any thing of General Harmar's ordering his cannon to fire upon them?

Answer. I remember that General Harmar once said, that if the militia behaved again in so scandalous a manner, that he would order his cannon to fire on them.

Ensign Britt being sworn, deposed: That, with respect to the personal conduct of General Harmar, he knew that he was indefatigable in making arrangements for the execution of the plans which had been formed for the expedition; and he also knew that the difficulties were great which the General had to encounter in organizing the militia, and in endeavoring to establish that harmony which was wanting in their commanding officers, Colonels Hardin and Trotter, which he accomplished apparently to their satisfaction; that he was at all times diligent in attending to the conduct of the officers in the different departments of the Army, and that he was always ready to attend to such occurrences as were consequent to the same, and the necessary exertions to have his orders carried into execution were not wanting; but that there were great deficiencies on the part of the militia, either owing to the want of authority in some of their officers, or from their ignorance or inattention; that the generality of them scarcely deserved the name of anything like soldiers; that they were mostly substitutes for others, who had nothing to stimulate them to do their duty; that, as to the dispositions for the order of march, form of encampment, and order of battle, they were matters which he, being a young officer, could say little about; he presumed they would answer for themselves; that the General's motives for detaching Colonel Hardin on the 14th October, when they were told they were but ten leagues from the Indian towns, he supposed to be, from information they received by a prisoner who was taken on the 13th; that the Indians at the

Maumee village were in great consternation and confusion, and the prospects were, they might be easily defeated if found in that situation; that, in order to support this detachment, the horses of the Army were ordered to be tied up at night, so that the whole Army might be ready to march early in the morning, which was done accordingly; and that, when Colonel Hardin reached the village, the main body was not more than five or six miles in his rear; that the detachment under Colonel Trotter was ordered to reconnoitre for three days the neighborhood, to endeavor to find out the savages, who had fled from their towns; that this party returned the evening of the same day they started, and next morning Colonel Hardin marched with the same party and fell in with the Indians; that an engagement ensued, in which he was routed, owing to the cowardly behaviour of the militia under his command; that the motives which he conceived led to detaching the party under Major Wylls, on the 21st, were, that the Indians, having avoided engaging the whole Army, would collect at their towns, and harass the rear and flanks as much as possible on its return, and a stroke at them before they could assemble in large bodies, would prevent their doing it with much effect; that the party accordingly met with the Indians, and a battle followed, in which numbers were killed on both sides; that the moment the news of this arrived in camp, Major Ray, with his battalion of Kentucky militia, was ordered to march to the support of Major Wylls, but that he did not proceed far before he returned.

Question by the Court. Did you, at any time in the course of the campaign, perceive that General Harmar was intoxicated?

Answer. I did not; I lived in the General's family, and should have known it, had anything of that kind happened.

Doctor Allison being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the Army, the orders of march, encampment, and battle, were questions which would be more amply answered by a reference to the Orderly Book, than they could be from the mere relation of an individual, or from any other official information; that, as to the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, those were questions which, if answered at all, must be merely speculative opinions, which it was not always prudent to divulge, nor would they, in his judgment, be admitted as evidence, or even perused by any tribunal, and therefore were nugatory; as he had not the honor of being in the Cabinet, it was utterly out of his power to give any other; that, as soon as the news arrived of the misfortune of the third detachment, a reinforcement was immediately ordered by the General, but whether it actually set out, or what induced it to return, he could not say, or whether sufficiently strong, he did not conceive himself a judge; his situation as surgeon prevented a minute attention to every, or indeed any of the arrangements of the Army; yet, as far as they came within his view or knowledge, they were judicious and uniform; that every attention was paid to the Army, by the General, in every situation; that every step was taken by him that prudence and military knowledge could suggest, the circumstances of the Army would permit, or that necessity required.

Lieutenant Denny being sworn, deposed: That General Harmar began his preparations for the campaign soon after the 15th July, and that every day was employed in the most industrious manner; that the calculations for provisions, horses, and stores were immediately made out, and orders given accordingly; that great exertions were used by Captain Ferguson to get in readiness the artillery and military stores; and, indeed, every officer was busily engaged, under the eye of the General, in fitting out necessary matter for the expedition, but particularly the Quartermaster—not a moment's time appeared to be lost; 15th and 16th September, the Kentucky militia arrived, but instead of seeing active riflemen, such as is supposed to inhabit the frontiers, they saw a parcel of men, young in the country, and totally inexperienced in the business they came upon, so much so that many of them did not even know how to keep their arms in firing order; indeed, their whole object seemed to be nothing more than to see the country, without rendering any service whatever. A great many of their guns wanted repairs; and, as they could not put them in order, our artificers were obliged to be employed; a considerable number came without any guns at all; Kentucky seemed as if she wished to comply with the requisitions of Government as ineffectually as possible, for it was evident that about two-thirds of the men served only to swell their numbers—19th September, a small detachment of Pennsylvania militia arrived, and the 25th of September Major Doughty, with two companies of Federal troops, joined them from Muskingum. Governor St. Clair had arrived from New York the 22d, and the remains of the Pennsylvania militia came on the 25th. The militia last mentioned were similar to the other—too many substitutes. The General lost no time in organizing them, though he met with many difficulties—the Colonels were disputing for the command, and the one most popular was least entitled to it. The General's design was to reconcile all parties, which he accomplished after much trouble. The Kentuckians composed three battalions, under Majors Hall, McMullen, and Ray, with Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Trotter at their head. The Pennsylvanians were formed into one battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Trubey and Major Paul, the whole to be commanded by Colonel John Hardin, subject to the orders of General Harmar. That, on the 26th of September, the militia marched on the route towards the Indian towns; the 30th, the General having got forward all the supplies that he expected, he moved out with the Federal troops, formed into two small battalions under the immediate command of Major Wylls and Major Doughty, together with Captain Ferguson's company of artillery, and three pieces of ordnance. On the 3d of October, General Harmar joined the advanced troops early in the morning; the remaining part of the day was spent in forming the line of march, the order of encampment and battle, and explaining the same to the militia field officers. General Harmar's orders will show the several formations. On the 4th, the Army took up the order of march, as is described in the orders. On the 5th, a reinforcement of horsemen and mounted infantry joined from Kentucky. The dragoons were formed into two troops; the mounted riflemen made a company, and this small battalion of light troops were put under the command of Major Fontaine. The whole of General Harmar's command, then, may be stated thus:

3 battalions of Kentucky militia	1,133
1 do Pennsylvania militia	320
1 do light troops, mounted militia	-
2 do Federal troops	-

The line of march was certainly one of the best that could be adopted, and great attention was paid to keep the officers with their commands in proper order, and the pack-horses, &c., as compact as possible. The order of encampment appeared well calculated both for defence and to preserve the horses and cattle from being lost; however, notwithstanding every precaution taken, and repeated orders given to the horse-masters to huddle well their horses, and directions to officers and men not to suffer any to pass through the lines, many of them, owing to the carelessness of the militia, and the scarcity of food, (though great attention was paid in the choice of ground,) broke loose and strayed through the lines after night, and even passed the chain of sentries which encircled the camp, and were lost. Patrols of horsemen were ordered out every morning by day-light to scour the neighboring woods, and to bring in any horses that might have broke through the lines, and a standing order directed the pickets to turn out small parties and drive in every horse. This was done, he believed, to expedite the movement of the Army. There was no less attention paid to securing the cattle; every evening when the Army halted, the guard, which was composed of a commissioned officer and thirty or thirty-five men, built a yard always within the chain of sentries, and sometimes in the square of encampment, and placed a sufficient number of sentries round the enclosure, which effectually preserved them; there was not more than two or three head lost during the whole of the campaign.

On the 13th of October, early in the morning, a patrol of horsemen captured a Shawnee Indian. On the 14th of October, Colonel Hardin was detached with six hundred light troops to push for the Miami village; he believed that this detachment was sent forward in consequence of the intelligence gained of the Shawnee prisoner, which was that the Indians were clearing out as fast as possible, and that if they did not make more haste, the towns would be evacuated before their arrival. As it was impossible for the main body of the Army, with all their train, to hasten their march much, the General thought proper to send on Colonel Hardin, in hopes of taking a few before they would all get off. This night the horses were all ordered to be tied up, that the Army might start by day-light, on purpose to keep as near Colonel Hardin as possible; the distance to the Indian towns, when the detachment marched ahead, was about thirty-five miles. On the 15th, every exertion was used to get forward the main body this day; they found that the advanced party had gained but very few miles. On the 16th, in the evening, met an express from Colonel Hardin, who had got into the village, informing the General that the enemy had abandoned every place. On the 17th, about noon, the Army arrived at the Omec towns. On the 18th Colonel Trotter was ordered out with three hundred men, militia and regulars, to reconnoitre the country, and to endeavor to make some discoveries of the enemy; he marched but a few miles, when his advanced horsemen came upon two Indians, and killed them; the Colonel was contented with this victory, and returned to camp. Colonel Hardin was displeased because Colonel Trotter did not execute his orders, and requested the General to give him the command of the party; it was granted, and accordingly Hardin marched next morning; but he believed he had not two-thirds of his number when two miles from camp; for to his certain knowledge, many of the militia left him on the march, and returned to their companies; whether he knew it or not he could not tell, but that he proceeded on, with a determination to trace some fresh signs of the enemy; he believed the plan was merely to gain some knowledge of the savages. He at length came upon a party, not exceeding one hundred, but was worsted; owing entirely, as he was informed, to the scandalous behaviour of the militia, many of whom never fired a shot, but ran off at the first noise of the Indians, and left the few regulars to be sacrificed; some of them never halted until they crossed the Ohio. The Army, in the mean time, was employed burning and destroying the houses and corn, shifting their position from one town to another; that, on the 21st of October, the Army having burned five villages, besides the capital town, and consumed or destroyed near twenty thousand bushels of corn in ears, took up the line of march on the route back to Fort Washington, and encamped about eight miles from the ruins; that, about 9 o'clock, P. M., the General ordered out four hundred choice men, militia and regulars, under the command of Major Wyllis, to return to the towns, intending to surprise any parties that might be assembled there, supposing that the Indians would collect to see how things were left. The General had felt the enemy, knew their strength, and calculated much upon the success of this enterprise; that it was the general opinion the force of the savages was nothing equal to this detachment, and unless by some such means, there was no possibility of getting any advantage of them; however, the best laid plan was in some measure defeated by the disobedience of the militia, who ran in pursuit of small parties, and left Major Wyllis unsupported; the consequence was, that the Major with most part of the regulars were killed, and our loss was equal if not greater than the savages; that the intention of this detachment was evident to all the Army, and would have answered the fullest expectations, provided a due obedience had been observed on the part of the militia; to provide against disobedience of orders was what he believed no one would think of; and, had it not been the case, the Major in his opinion might have returned crowned with laurels; that the main body waited for the return of this detachment; but, to their mortification, about 11 o'clock A. M. of the 22d, a fellow who ran back from the field, gave them information of Major Wyllis' misfortune; General Harmar immediately despatched Major Ray with his battalion to the assistance of the parties, but the Major did not get the length, before he met Colonel Hardin returning to camp with his wounded. He was led to believe that about this time the General lost the confidence he had in the militia; those of them among the dead were of the best men; that the effective strength was very much reduced by sickness and otherwise; the regular troops did not furnish more than two hundred; they were in his opinion very insufficient; and he was also clearly of opinion, that had the enemy made an attack upon their camp that evening, or the morning following, the militia were so panic-struck that very few of them would have stood; the consequences that would have happened startled every person with horror; the sick and wounded, and all the stores, artillery, &c., would have fallen a prey to the savages; that this was also the opinion of several of the principal officers, who advised General Harmar of the danger of attempting to return to the town, from the time it would take up, and the probability that the delay would give the savages time to collect from distant quarters. He observed that the 22d of October was employed in fixing biers for the wounded, and in making repairs. He also observed, that the frost had destroyed the food early on their march out, and that the horses of the Army were now become very much reduced; so much so, that it was utterly impossible for the main body to perform any thing rapidly, and to get back upon the road, which they had so lately passed, was attended with difficulty; he said that the greatest attention was paid, the little Army was kept compact, and vigilance was the word from all who had any reputation to lose; that the militia on their return began to be refractory, showing great signs of a revolt, discharging their pieces in open defiance of the General's orders; some of them, however, were detected and punished, which gave umbrage, and was afterwards the cause of many ill-natured reports, spread without any foundation, to injure the General's reputation. He further observed, that the Army returned by slow marches back to Fort Washington; that General Harmar's conduct during the campaign was observed to be sober, steady, and attentive to the service; and, as his duty required him to be frequently near the General, should certainly have discovered it had he been at any time intoxicated, as has been reported. Every evening, as duty as the Army halted, the General made his remarks for that day, and issued orders for the movement and arrangements for the next, and every morning he was found among the first prepared for the field. The Court adjourned until to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 18, 9 o'clock, A. M.

The Court met agreeably to adjournment, and again adjourned to September 19, at three o'clock, P. M.

September 19, three o'clock, P. M.—The Court having met again, adjourned to to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 20th.—The Court having met, according to adjournment:

Major Ziegler being sworn, deposed: That some time had elapsed before the different corps and battalions could be organized, on account of rank; the militia officers disputing for the command; and after a good deal of exertion by General Harmar, they commenced their march on the 30th September, 1790—the militia under Colonel Hardin, having been sent on a few days before; and on the 3d October they joined the militia, and took up their line of march, and encamped as mentioned in the General's orders. He observed that the orders of march and encampment, motions, &c., were such as would have done honor to the first officers either in America or Europe. All necessary precautions were observed to gain the point General Harmar set out for. On the 14th of October he was ordered to advance, with Colonel Hardin, commanding fifty rank and file of the Federal troops, being part of six hundred men. At 10 o'clock they took up their march, and before they left the ground the rest of the Army was ordered to parade and follow them; he remembered to have seen the Army from an eminence, as he inclined towards the left, with the column to which he was attached. The 15th, at about 3 o'clock, P. M., they arrived at the Miami villages, and at the same time Colonel Hardin sent an express to General Harmar, to inform him that the villages were evacuated. It was his opinion that the motive for this manœuvre was in consequence of a Shawanese, whom they took a few days before, and who acquainted the General that the Indians were ready to move away. The Army arrived the 17th, in the forenoon; and that day, as well as the rest, they were all busy in destroying the Indian corn, &c. He further observed, that on the 18th, Colonel Trotter was detached, with three hundred men of the militia, including thirty Federal troops, but that the Colonel returned the same day, without bringing any information; and that on the morning following, Colonel Hardin took the command of the same party, and advanced to procure some knowledge of the enemy; and on his discovering the enemy, those which were in the rear would not come up and support those engaged in front, and very few of those in front stopped, but ran, and the militia fled in a shameful manner, and the few Federal troops not supported, fell a sacrifice. The Major said, that a sergeant of militia behaving very improperly at that time, could not be brought to trial, on account of a brother of his being a Captain, and who made parties that would have been attended with bad consequences, should he be punished, as his brother declared he would raise some men and bid defiance. That on the 21st October, 1790, after they had destroyed a great quantity of corn and five or six villages, they took up their line of march towards Fort Washington; and at night, Major Wylls was detached with four hundred choice men, in hopes to surprise a body that might be at the ruins: this party was supposed to be sufficiently strong for any number of the enemy embodied. Major Wylls marched in three columns, with intention to join with the right and left columns at the Miami village, but that the column under the command of Major M'Mullen fell in with a small party of Indians; they followed them, and disobeyed the orders of Major Wylls in pursuing them and leaving the others unsupported, and so was the left wing; which would not have been if they had joined them, as he supposed it to be sufficiently strong for that party.

He also remembered very well being on picket, or commanding one of the wings as Captain an Carr, when the first men arrived with the intelligence that their party had gained ground, and at that very instant General Harmar ordered Major Ray with his battalion to the assistance of those engaged, lest that information should not prove true, but he went but two miles or two and a half, then meeting the scattered detachment returned, to the great surprise of General Harmar; that the success of the detachment was defeated, in a great measure, by the militia running ahead, and leaving Major Wylls unsupported. The Army remained this day in dressing and fixing the wounded. The militia behaving so bad in several instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them, otherwise, he would have returned with the Army, but, as things were situated, it would have been running too great a hazard. The Army returned back to Fort Washington. Nothing appeared wanting on the part of the General. Every attention was paid to the Army to guard against surprise. The Major observed that there had been very injurious reports spread about General Harmar, but, if he was to be credited, he knew of nothing that could be alleged against him, or that could possibly injure his reputation in any respect. The good of the service appeared to be his constant study.

Question by the Court. I think, sir, you said that on the 15th, at three o'clock P. M. you arrived at the Miami village, what did you do after your arrival there? were the militia in good order?

Answer. When we arrived we were very much fatigued, having marched twenty-eight miles that day, I directed that my own men should not go thirty yards from camp. The militia like a rabble strolled into the neighboring villages, in parties of thirty or forty after plunder, such was the situation that one hundred and fifty warriors might have beat us off the ground.

Question by the Court. Did you see any desire in the militia to return to the ground where Major Wylls was defeated, or do you suppose they would have gone had they been ordered to go?

Answer. I suppose they would not have gone; they appeared to be panic-struck.

Question by the Court. Are you of opinion that the personal conduct of the General was regular, steady, and tended to the good of the service?

Answer. Undoubtedly so, and very much to the credit of the General.

Question by the Court. From your long knowledge of service do you think that from the complexion of the troops General Harmar had to organize, that the formation of the Army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was.

Question. Do you think that the order of march and encampment, were calculated to secure every part of the Army and its appendages?

Answer. Yes, very much so.

Question by the Court. From your experience, do you think that the order of battle directed by General Harmar, was judicious?

Answer. Yes, perfectly so.

Captain Doyle being sworn, deposed: That previous to the campaign going out last Fall, every day was employed in the most industrious manner; on the arrival of the Kentucky militia they were all much disappointed; that instead of seeing complete riflemen, many were armed with old muskets, much out of repair; the General immediately ordered them repaired with all expedition. He referred the Court as to the line of march, to the General's Orderly Book, and informed the Court, that the personal conduct of the General through the campaign was uniform and steady, and that had the General's orders been strictly obeyed, he was confident he must come home with honor. As to what influenced the General to make detachments he could not say; he was in the detachment of the 14th October, and that the behaviour of the militia in that detachment, was very disgraceful; they ran from town to town in pursuit of plunder, contrary to orders, and on the arrival of General Harmar at the town, two-thirds of them dispersed in the same manner; the General ordered cannon to be fired, merely to collect them, and he at the same time harangued the officers, informing them of the ill consequences of such conduct. That the General's not returning to the village after the ill success of the last detachment, he believed was owing to his not having confidence in his Army. At that time there was a great rumor in camp, the general voice was for returning, their horses were much worn down, and the militia showed great signs of revolt. The reports that the militia circulated after their return home, and which was much to the prejudice of General Harmar, was, he believed, owing to the General's having a few of them punished for disobedience of orders; he thought it certain, that they had no grounds for their ill-natured reports, and that General Harmar would have been justifiable in arresting one or two of the most popular field-officers, and sending them home with disgrace; but a thing of that kind, he observed, would have broken up the Army. He knew of no part of the Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

General's conduct, during the whole of the campaign, that could be censured, without it was showing too much lenity to the militia, and thanking them for their conduct, when they merited punishment.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the sending the detachment under Major Wylls, tended eventually to the preservation of the Army?

Answer. I think the Indians would have harassed us very much on our return if that detachment had not been made.

Question by General Harmar. Did the enemy annoy the Army at all after that detachment was made?

Answer. No, they did not.

Question by General Harmar. Did we see any Indians afterward?

Answer. We did not.

Lieutenant Sedam being sworn, deposed: That he had the honor of serving under General Harmar last Fall, on a campaign against the Indians of the Maumee village, and that he saw nothing in his conduct, but what he thought was very proper; that relative to the organization of the Army he was but little acquainted, and therefore referred the Court to the General's Orderly Book; that he was entirely unacquainted with General Harmar's motives for sending out the different detachments, and if those detachments were not properly supported, it did not appear to him to be the fault of the General, for the militia were a poor set, and behaved very ill upon all occasions; that, after the first action, he heard Major Paul, of the Pennsylvania militia, say: he hoped General Harmar would not put any confidence in them, for he was sure they would not fight.

Question by General Harmar. When I was upon the return at Chillicothe, I ordered one of the militia to be whipped, I was informed that Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen said I had no right to punish them. Did you hear me reprimand them for that conduct?

Answer. After the man was punished, I heard you say to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would send them both home with disgrace for their bad conduct.

Ensign Armstrong being sworn, deposed as follows: That the militia being ordered into battalions and organized, in which he knew the General met with great difficulty; that the order of march and encampment could be better ascertained by a reference to the Orderly Book, than any thing he could add on the subject; that the conduct of the militia in every instance seemed calculated to obstruct every measure adopted by General Harmar; that the conduct of the General in every particular, was perfectly consistent and uniform, and every step taken by him appeared to be the dictate of prudence and sobriety; that what induced the General to send out the detachments, was wholly unknown to him, and therefore unspeakable by him.

Captain Armstrong being sworn, deposed: That on report being made to General Harmar, by Major M'Mullen and others, that the tracks of women and children had been seen on the route leading towards the Kickapoo town, a Northwest course, and supposing the enemy had left their families and baggage not far distant from camp, General Harmar, on the morning of October 18th, detached Colonel Trotter, Colonel Hall, Major Ray, and Major M'Mullen, with thirty Federal troops, the mounted infantry, part of the cavalry, and a detachment of militia, amounting in the whole to 300 men. After they had proceeded about one mile, the cavalry gave chase to an Indian who was mounted; him they overtook and killed; before they returned to the column, a second one appeared, on which the four field officers left their commands, and pursued, leaving the troops near half an hour without any directions whatever. The cavalry came across the second Indian, and after wounding one of their party killed him also. When the infantry came up to this place, they immediately fell into confusion, and he gained permission to leave them some distance on the road, where he formed an ambuscade. After he had been some time at his station, a fellow on horseback came to him, who had lost the party in pursuit of the first Indian; he was much frightened, and said he had been pursued by fifty mounted Indians. That on his telling this story to Colonel Trotter, notwithstanding his observations to him, he changed his route, marched in various directions until night, when he returned to camp. That, on their arrival in camp, General Harmar sent for him; and after answering him many questions ordered one subaltern and twenty militia to join his command. With those he crossed the river St. Joseph about ten at night, and with a guide proceeded to an Indian town, about two miles distant, where he continued with his party until the morning of the 19th. His party fired upon an Indian and retook from him two horses. About nine o'clock he joined the remainder of the detachment under Colonel Harmar. They marched on the route Colonel Trotter had pursued the day before, and after passing a morass about five miles distant, they came to where the enemy had encamped the day before. Here they made a short halt, and the commanding officer disposed of the parties at a distance from each other; after a halt of half an hour, they were ordered to move on, and Captain Faulkner's company was left on the ground, the Colonel having neglected giving him orders to move on. After they had proceeded about three miles, they fell in with two Indians on foot who threw off their packs, and the brush being thick, made their escape. He then asked Colonel Harmar where Captain Faulkner was? He said, he was lost, and then sent Major Fontaine with part of the cavalry in search of him, and moved on with the remainder of the troops. That, some time after, he informed Colonel Harmar a gun had been fired in their front, which might be considered as an alarm gun, and that he saw where a horse had come down the road, and returned again; but the Colonel still moved on, giving no orders, nor making any arrangements for an attack. That, some time after, he discovered the enemy's fires at a distance, and informed the Colonel, who replied, that they would not fight, and rode in front of the advance, until fired on from behind the fires; when he the Colonel retreated, and with him all the militia except nine, who continued with him, and were instantly killed, with twenty-four of the Federal troops; and seeing his last man fall and being surrounded by the savages, he threw himself into a thicket and remained there three hours in daylight; during that time he had an opportunity of seeing the enemy pass and repass, and conceived their numbers did not amount to one hundred men; that some were mounted, others armed with rifles, and the advance with tomahawks only. He was of opinion that had Colonel Trotter proceeded on the 18th, agreeably to his orders, having killed the enemy's sentinels, they would have surprised their camp and with ease defeated them, or had Colonel Hardin arranged his troops, or made any military disposition on the 19th, that they would have gained a victory; their defeat he therefore ascribed to two causes, the unofficer-like conduct of Colonel Hardin (who he believed was a brave man) and the cowardly behaviour of the militia; many of them threw down their arms loaded, and he believed that none, except the party under his command, fired a gun. What he saw of the conduct of the militia on that day, and what he felt by being under the command of a man who wanted military talents, had caused him to determine, that he would not willingly fight with the one, or be commanded by the other. That he referred the Court to the Orderly Book which pointed out the line of march, encampment and battle.

Question by the Court. Are you clearly of opinion that if the militia had done their duty, they were fully competent to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. I think they were fully so.

Question by the Court. According to your ideas, as an officer of experience, was the formation and arrangement of the different corps of the Army by General Harmar at the commencement of the expedition judicious?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Did the line of march appear to you to be a judicious one, calculated for the protection of the Army in all its parts?

Answer. I think so.

Question by the Court. Do you think the mode of encampment was calculated both for defence and protection?

Answer. As much so as any one that could possibly be adopted?

Question by the Court. What was your opinion of the General's order of battle?

Answer. I think it was a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the making the detachment of the 21st, was in its consequences useful to the return of the Army?

Answer. I can judge from circumstances only; that we were not harassed by the enemy afterwards.

Question by the Court. Do you know if any detachment was made for the purpose of supporting Major Wyllis?

Answer. As soon as information of the Major's misfortune arrived in camp, the General ordered all the troops under arms, but whether any detachment was made from them or not, I do not know.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose that if General Harmar had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I am of opinion that if a serious attack had been made, in fifteen minutes the militia would have deserted us and left the Federal troops and artillery to be sacrificed.

Question by General Harmar. Do you recollect the proceedings of the militia at Chillicothe on our return?

Answer. I recollect your saying to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would post them in their country for their unsoldier-like conduct and that they ought to be hanged.

Ensign Shamburgh being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the Army under General Harmar was, as far as he was capable of judging in military affairs, exceedingly well; that the march, encampment, and order of battle were also, in his opinion, very well planned; that he was not capable of judging of the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October; but it was his opinion, at that time, that the General was apprehensive, that as the savages had been successful in the preceding engagements, they would harass his Army on his return; in consequence thereof, he ordered the party commanded by Major Wyllis in order to check them, which he believed had its effect; he recollected that the different detachments sent out were numerous, and, he believed, sufficient to fight such number of Indians as were then together, if the commanding officers thereof had taken more precaution; he had been told at the time that Major Ray was ordered to support Major Wyllis, but he could not determine whether that officer had obeyed his orders. He observed, that the loss of so many pack-horses was owing to the neglect of horsemasters, notwithstanding the repeated orders of the General on that head; it appeared to him as if they were parties concerned, and glad to lose their horses, because they had a very great praise for the same. He observed that he did duty in the Ordnance Department at that time, and had fifty pack-horses under his direction, which gave him an opportunity to know the negligence and incapacity of both horsemasters and drivers.

Question by General Harmar. Do you think after the last detachment was made under Major Wyllis, and the remains of his party returned to camp, that the militia would have gone back if they had been ordered?

Answer. I think not.

Question by the Court. Was the appearance of the militia, after the action of the 21st, orderly or disorderly?

Answer. Very disorderly.

Question by the Court. Was there any particular cause ascribed, that you heard of, for their disorderly conduct?

Answer. Not that I know of, the militia, both officers and men, seemed determined to go home, and said frequently that ten Federal regiments should not keep them.

Question by the Court. Did you observe whether the militia were as well treated as the Federal troops?

Answer. Perfectly the same.

Ensign Gaines, who was Captain of horse in General Harmar's expedition, being sworn, deposed: That on the expedition he was almost every evening at General Harmar's tent until the 24th October, when he was detached forward to Fort Washington, and that during the whole time he did not see General Harmar in the least intoxicated with liquor, but that on the contrary the General conducted the Army in a manner which, in his estimation, did him great honor. He further observed, that he had served on a number of expeditions against the savages, undertaken by the militia of Kentucky, and that he never saw in any of them, the like good order and military arrangement, which accompanied General Harmar's expedition; he also observed, that the people in Kentucky never alleged any charge against General Harmar, until Colonel John Hardin had acquitted himself before a Board of Inquiry of several charges exhibited against him, respecting his conduct on that expedition; that the populace finding nothing they could say to the prejudice of the Colonel would be believed, levelled their malice at General Harmar. He did not conceive that any thing would have been said against the General in that country, if a Baptist preacher's son, who resided there, had not been whipped in the Army for disobedience of orders.

Question by the Court. I think you say you have been in several expeditions against the Indians; did the militia who were with General Harmar conduct better or worse than those in other expeditions?

Answer. Much better, sir.

Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 19th?

Answer. I was.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion, that if the militia had been properly arranged in that action, and would have fought, that they would have been sufficient to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. Yes; for it appeared to me that the Indians were surprised; that if Colonel Trotter on the preceding day had not returned, he most certainly must have been in their camp, and completely defeated them; for I had taken two of their spies the day before, which appeared to be the only two they had out.

Question by the Court. Do you think that, if General Harmar had ordered the Army back, after the action of the 21st, that the militia would have gone?

Answer. They would not have gone willingly. I think in that case there would have been danger of mutiny. When the militia of Major Wyllis' detachment were ordered to march, they appeared unwilling to go, and some were so much so as to cry.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the movement of the detachment under Major Wyllis had a good effect in securing the Army from being attacked and harassed on its return?

Answer. I think it had a very good effect.

Question by the Court. Did the Indians ever attack you afterwards?

Answer. Not while I continued with the Army.

Captain Asheton, being sworn, deposed: That the organization of General Harmar's Army was a source of trouble and difficulty, arising from disputes among the militia officers for precedence; but, when effected, was in all its parts systematical; that the organization of the Army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, when duly considered, cannot fail to raise the General in the estimation of every military man. That it had been basely reported that the General was in a state of intoxication nearly the whole of the campaign; and this he asserted to be a malicious falsehood; and he averred that his personal conduct during that time will ever do him honor. He said the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, could only be accounted for by the General himself; but he supposed that the detachment under Colonel Hardin was sent in consequence of information gained from a prisoner taken on the morning of the 13th, and from a Frenchman employed as a guide, who reported that it was something more than half a day's ride from a place called the French Store (at which place the Army encamped the night of the 13th) to the Maumee villages. This detachment was supported by the whole Army, and moved off the ground at the same time with as much rapidity as possible, and arrived at the villages on the 17th where the Army encamped. On the morning of the 18th I mounted guard in front of the encampment. In the course of that day I was informed that a detachment of three hundred men were ordered out under Colonel Trotter, with three days' provisions, with orders to scour the country; but they returned the same evening to camp, without effecting anything. Colonel Hardin, disgusted at the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and anxious to retrieve the lost honor of his countrymen, solicited the same command, which was granted. He marched on the morning of the 19th, while he was yet on guard, and was defeated the same day by the Indians. He could not say what influenced the General to send out a detachment on the 21st, but he observed that the Indians were flushed with success in the action of the 19th. That it had become necessary to give them a sudden check, in order to prevent the Army from being harassed on its return; and that, if this was the General's intention, he was fully persuaded it had its desired effect. On the 21st the Army marched eight miles from the Maumee villages, on its return. Late that night a corps of three hundred and forty militia and sixty of the Federal troops, under the command of Major Wyllis, were detached, that they might gain the vicinity of the Maumee villages before the morning, and surprise any Indians who might be found there. The detachment marched in three columns, the Federal troops in the centre, at the head of which he was posted, with Major Wyllis and Colonel Hardin in his front; the militia formed the columns to the right and left. From several delays, occasioned by the militia's halting, they did not reach the banks of the Onnee till some time after sunrise. The spies then discovered the enemy, and reported to Major Wylls, who halted the Federal troops, and moved the militia on some distance in front, where he gave his orders and plan of attack to the several commanding officers of corps; those orders were not communicated to him; that Major Wylls reserved the command of the Federal troops to himself. Major Hall, with his battalion, was directed to take a circuitous route round the head of the Onnee river, cross the Pickaway Fort, (or St. Mary's,) which brought him directly in the rear of the enemy, and there wait until the attack should commence with Major McMullen's battalion, Major Fontaine's cavalry, and Major Wylls with the Federal troops, who all crossed the Onnee at and near the common fording place. After the attack commenced the troops were by no means to separate, but were to embody, or the battalions to support each other as circumstances required. From this disposition it appeared evident that it was the intention of Major Wylls to surround the enemy; and that if Colonel Hall, who had gained his ground undiscovered, had not wantonly disobeyed his orders, by firing on a single Indian, the surprise must have been complete. The Indians then fled with precipitation, the battalions of militia pursuing in different directions. Major Fontaine made a charge upon a small party of savages; he fell the first fire, and his troops dispersed. The Federal troops, who were then left unsupported, became an easy sacrifice to much the largest party of Indians that had been seen that day. It was his opinion that the misfortunes of that day were owing to the separation of troops and disobedience of orders. After the Federal troops were defeated, and the firing in all quarters nearly ceased, Colonel Hall and Major McMullen, with their battalions, met in the town, and, after discharging, cleaning, and fresh loading their arms, which took up about half an hour, proceeded to join the Army unmolested. He was convinced that the detachment, if it had been kept embodied, was sufficient to have answered the fullest expectations of the General, and needed no support; but he was informed that a battalion under Major Ray was ordered out for that purpose.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that, if the General had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not think they would.

Lieutenant Kersey, being sworn, deposed: That when the militia arrived at Fort Washington, they were formed into battalions and properly organized. He knew that General Harmar had a great deal of difficulty to get them arranged; their arms and accoutrements were in very bad order. He wished to refer the Court to the General's Orderly Book for information relative to the order of march. In his opinion General Harmar's conduct was uniform, steady, and sober, during the whole expedition. He was also of opinion that the detachment of the 14th was in consequence of information received from a prisoner, taken the morning before, which was, that the enemy were running away; and the detachment of the 19th was to gain some knowledge of them, and the detachment of the 21st was to surprise and take advantage of them; which, in his opinion, would have happened had the militia attended to the directions and plan laid down for that enterprise. He observed that the reduced state of the pack-horses, notwithstanding every attention was paid to secure and keep them in good condition, rendered it impossible for the Army to take any advantage of the enemy. The militia had proved that they were not to be depended upon; their dastardly behaviour, in three instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them. He therefore determined to return, and not to hazard another engagement, unless the enemy came in reach of the main body. That the Army took up the march to return to Fort Washington, and it was with great difficulty that the General kept them together until they arrived there.

Question by the Court. From your knowledge of service, is it your opinion that the organization of the Army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was. Question by the Court. Do you think that all the movements of the Army were so connected as to be able to sustain each other in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Do you think that through the course of the campaign the General's conduct was open and decisive throughout?

Answer. I think it was.

Question by the Court. Was the conduct of the militia tolerably regular on their advance towards the Maumee towns?

Answer. It was more regular than it was on the return; but it was very irregular.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose it was necessary to make the detachment of the 21st, in order to prevent the Indians harassing the Army on its return?

Answer. I think it was, and for that purpose.

Question by the Court. If the General had ordered the Army to return to the towns, after Major Wylls' misfortune, would the militia have gone?

Answer. I think they would not; they would have mutinied.

Question by the Court. Was the Army harassed by the Indians after the 21st, on its return?

Answer. Not to my knowledge; I believe there was not one seen.

The Court adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock, tomorrow morning.

SEPTEMBER 21.

The Court met according to adjournment. Major Harmar was sworn, and deposed: That General Harmar's conduct on his expedition in October, 1790, was at all times steady, calm, and deliberate, and was always attentive to the arrangements and applications made to him, and to the information given, as far as came under his observation; that he was often at his quarters and marched in front of the right column, which was generally within fifty yards of him. That the organization of the Army being published in the daily orders, would speak for itself; he, however, never heard an individual find fault with it during the campaign, or point out any defects, except in the commissary and pack-horse departments, and in those the execution, and not the arrangements were found fault with; that the order of march was in three columns, covered with front, rear, and flank guards, which order was generally preserved, and as well executed as could be expected with a body composed mostly of militia, and embarrassed with pack-horses; that the encampment was in a square with the baggage, horses, cattle, and stores in centre; guards were posted in such manner as to form a line of sentries round the whole, field officers appointed to dispose those guards, and to see duty well done, and they were so disposed as to prevent surprise, and had the horse department followed orders, would have secured the horses; as they had not occasion to form the line of battle, he could not determine how it would have been executed, but it was simple, easy to be understood, and universally approved. With respect to making the detachments, he had never been in council, and could only assign such motives as offered themselves at the time from a concurrence of circumstances.

The detachment of the 14th, he presumed, at that time, was made in consequence of information obtained from a prisoner, that the Indians were confused and distracted in their councils, and was designed to surprise them, prevent their concerting measures to unite, and attack them, and not give them time to secure their provisions and property, and that the desired effect was answered, so far as to prevent their securing so much as they would otherwise have done. The whole Army was put in motion the moment the detachment moved off, and followed with as much rapidity as artillery and stores would admit of, to support the detachment; that the detachment of the 19th was made in consequence of repeated information of having discovered a trail of men, women, and children, and on the fullest assurance, as he was then informed, that the detachment was adequate for attacking the party they were in quest of. A corps de reserve was ordered, but never came up; it was dark before information was brought to the General that the party were defeated, and a support could not be sent that night; a detachment was ordered to march next morning, but for what purpose he could not say. The detachment of the 21st, he had every reason to believe, was made on the general system, viz: to find the enemy, and give them a check, to prevent their attacking and harassing the Army on the retreat, and on that principle the detaching was inevitable; he did not know that any support was ordered; he was on the left, but he knew that the greater part of the detachment came in very soon after the intelligence of the defeat was brought, and it was too late for giving any assistance. He did not expect that the General would make a detachment to support them, after the repeated proofs that the militia would not stand, and he presumed the situation of the horses would not admit of returning with the Army. He supposed the detachment calculated to cover itself, and doubtless would have happily succeeded, had the right and left columns obeyed the orders which it is said Major Wylls had given. He knew of no one circumstance in the General's conduct during the expedition, which ought to injure his reputation; and, though the misfortunes of the 21st were to be lamented, yet he believed the salvation of the remainder of the Army, the baggage, and stores, were due only to the making that detachment.

Question by the Court. On the arrival of the troops in camp, who were defeated on the 21st, do you think, from the state of mind the militia were in, that, if the General had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not know whether they would or not; but, if they had gone, and not having any place to retreat to, I am of opinion they would have fled as soon as they were attacked, and have left the Federal troops to be sacrificed.

The Court then adjourned to to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 22.

The Court having met according to adjournment, directed the Recorder to write the following letter to his Excellency General St. Clair:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

Sir: I am directed by the Court of Inquiry now sitting in this place, to inform your Excellency that the Court have gone through the examination of all the witnesses that have been adduced, and that those from Kentucky, who were referred to in your Excellency's letter to the President of the Court, have not appeared. The Court are now ready to close their proceedings, unless your Excellency has information of any further evidence being ready, of which the Court beg to be informed.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant, WINSLOW WARREN.

Recorder to the Court.

To His Excellency General St. Clair.

To which letter, his Excellency General St. Clair sent the following answer:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

Sir: You will please to inform the Court that I know of no evidences here, other than those that have been before them, and that it is not probable those from Kentucky will come forward. I therefore see no reason why the proceedings should not be closed.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Mr. WARREN,

Recorder to the Court of Inquiry.

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Soon after, the following letter was received:

SEPTEMBER 22, 1791.
SIR: Since I wrote to you a moment ago, I have been informed that it is probable more testimony will be offered to the Court in the course of this day. If the Court, then, have not already closed their proceedings, I wish they would be pleased to defer it until to-morrow morning, which please to inform them.

I am, sir, your humble servant,
A. ST. CLAIR.

Mr. WARREN.

To which the following answer was returned:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR: I am directed by the President of the Court of Inquiry to inform your Excellency that, in consequence of the last letter with which you were pleased to honor them, they have adjourned to meet to-morrow, at 9 o'clock, a. m.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient servant,
WINSLOW WARREN.

His Excellency General St. CLAIR.

The Court then adjourned to September 23d, 9 o'clock, a. m.

SEPTEMBER 23.

The Court met according to adjournment; and, no further evidences appearing, came to a resolution to close their proceedings.

The Court, having deliberately considered the evidence before them separately and aggregately, are unanimous in the following opinion:

1st. That the personal conduct of the said Brigadier General Harmar was irreproachable.

2d. That the organization of the Army was calculated to support harmony, and give mutual confidence to the several parts.

3d. That the order of march (a copy of which is annexed to these proceedings) was perfectly adapted to the country through which the Army had to pass.

4th. That the order of encampment and battle (plans of which are also subjoined) were judicious, and well calculated to give security to the camp, energy to the troops in case of attack, and simple in its execution.

5th. That there were just reasons for the detachments of the 14th and 19th of October; that the detachment of the 21st was made on good principles, and had the designed effect of securing the return of the Army, and preventing the enemy from harassing their rear; that the General had ordered support for the said detachment in time, but that his orders were not properly executed; and that the conduct of the said Brigadier General Josiah Harmar merits high approbation.

RICHARD BUTLER,

Major General, President.

Attest: WINSLOW WARREN,
Lieut. and Adj't to the 2d U. S. reg't,
Recorder to the Court.

[Here follow Diagrams of the order of battle.]

The depositions Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, have been handed in, and read to the Court. They have thought proper to subjoin them to their proceedings, for your Excellency's information.

No. 1.

Caleb Worley, of the county of Fayette, in the District of Kentucky, Lieutenant in Colonel Paterson's Battalion of Kentucky Militia, maketh oath, and saith: That this deponent served as Lieutenant in a Battalion of Kentucky Militia, commanded by Major McMullen, on the late expedition undertaken against the savages of the Omeo towns; and that he, this deponent, had very frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with Brigadier General Harmar, who commanded the whole forces so employed. And this deponent saith, that he never did, to the best of his knowledge, see the said General Harmar in a state of intoxication, nor wanting in that duty and attention which he owed to the safety and order of the troops under his command. And further saith not.

No. 4.

The affidavit of Colonel John Hardin, taken in consequence of a Court of Inquiry, to be held at Fort Washington, respecting the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar on the expedition against the Maumee towns, in October, 1790.

This deponent, being first sworn, deposeseth and saith: That, on his arrival with the Kentucky militia at the mouth of Licking, he commenced an acquaintance with General Harmar; found, from his conversation, that he had the good of his country and the expedition very much at heart; business was carried on regularly, and with as much expedition as the nature of the case would admit. About the 1st of October we proceeded on our march; after the line of march was formed the General issued his orders regularly, and observed very strictly that they were executed; on our march there was an Indian prisoner taken, who gave information that the Indians and French were repairing the Old Fort at the Maumee town, and that the Indians were not likely to get any of the neighboring tribes to join them; this prisoner also informed us they did not know that General Harmar had any artillery. After receiving this information the General and this deponent consulted upon the matter, and it was agreed to detach six hundred men, leaving all their heavy baggage, and march rapidly to the towns, hoping that the enemy would fly to their fort, provided the artillery was not discovered, and that six hundred, rank and file, would be sufficient to keep them in their fort until General Harmar arrived with the artillery and balance of the Army. Accordingly, when the General was informed by the guides that they were within thirty or thirty-five miles of the towns, there was a detachment ordered to make ready with all possible expedition; those orders were so pleasing to the officers that they disputed who should go, and some cast lots in order to settle the dispute; this deponent, being honored with the command, left the General with his detachment, and saw him no more until he arrived at the Maumee village, which he thinks was about three or four days after he left him, during which time he heard no complaints of General Harmar. After the General's arrival at the Maumee village, and the Indians all fled, he expressed a very great desire to make his route by the Wea town, on the Wabash; for this purpose there was a council ordered to be held; but, before the council met, finding the Indians had stolen, the night before, a number of pack-horses and some of the light-horsemen's horses, there was a stop put to the business, and the thoughts of the route by the Wea towns laid aside. There was an old French captive that was taken informed us the Indians were scattered in the woods, and were not able by any means to fight us, and that they had not got any assistance from other tribes; this induced this deponent to solicit the General for a command of about three or four hundred men, to range the woods for ten or twelve miles, which he granted, and ordered the three hundred men to be furnished with three days' provisions; these orders were as pleasing to the officers and soldiers as the former; Colonel Trotter insisted he had been promised a command; and, as it appeared this would be productive of something very clever, he wished to be indulged with the command of the detachment then ordered out, which was granted by the General, this deponent consenting thereto. Colonel Trotter marched on the morning of the 18th October, equipped for a tour of two or three days, in order to hunt up Indian camps; he returned on the evening of the same day, at the time the General and the deponent were about firing the guards, in order to capture any of the enemy that might come to steal horses. The General appeared much displeased with the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and ordered the same party out again that evening, and for this deponent to go next morning and take charge of them. This deponent, agreeably to the orders given, collected what he could of the party next morning; and, after proceeding about ten miles, fell in with a party of Indians, who began a very brisk fire on the detachment, who retired without making but very little resistance, notwithstanding all exertions to prevent them. This deponent, when he returned to camp, informed the General what had happened; that it was owing to the cowardly behaviour of the militia, and insisted on another party being sent to the battle-ground. The General informed this deponent he would let him know in the morning. Accordingly he told him that he had not completed the object that he was ordered to do, and that if anything should happen to prevent him, he should be reflected on, as he had been in the possession of the towns so long, and had not destroyed them, that he would first give orders for that purpose, and then he would be better able to judge what was best to be done. On the morning of the 20th orders were given for destroying the towns, which was executed accordingly. At this time the men appeared more timid than before; the General told this deponent he thought it would not answer a good purpose to go to the battle-ground, as the spirits of the men appeared to be very low at hearing of so many men being killed, and that the sight of the mangled bodies would make them much more so; and the Indians, if not able to fight us, would be gone; and that he should give orders to take up the line of march to Fort Washington. Accordingly, on the morning of the 21st, we left the towns and began our march for the mouth of Licking, in about eight or nine miles encamped. The night being very clear, and the moon giving light, this deponent informed the General that he thought it would be a good opportunity to steal a march on the Indians, as he had reason to believe they returned to the towns as soon as they knew the Army had left it. The General did not appear fond of sending a party back, but this deponent urged the matter, informing the General that, as he had been unfortunate the other day, he wished to have it in his power to pick the militia and try it again; and at the same time endeavored to account for the men's not fighting, and desired an opportunity to retrieve the credit of the militia; the General appeared not to be of opinion the enemy would return so soon, but told this deponent he might take about one hundred men and go back; this deponent replied he did not wish to go back with less than five or six hundred men; the General answered that the troops were very much fatigued, and that it would not answer any valuable purpose to send so many men; this deponent then left the General; in about half an hour he was sent for, when the General informed him that he intended to send Major Wyllys back with all the Federal troops that could be spared, saying, at the same time, they were the men that would stand to the work, and that he wanted about one hundred of our best militia. After some conversation between the General and this deponent, the latter went to Major Wyllys and told him he did not like his going back with so few men; the Major, also thinking the number too few, wished this deponent to speak to the General on the subject, which was done. Major McMullen and Major Hall were then sent for, and the design made known to them; they both appeared well pleased with the affair; it was then proposed what number of men would be sufficient, this deponent recommending from four to six hundred; they both concluded that four hundred men were fully sufficient. The General seemed perfectly satisfied that any number of troops that were thought adequate to the purpose should be ordered; accordingly, four hundred men, consisting of sixty regulars, three hundred foot militia, and forty horsemen, rank and file, properly officered, were ordered to be ready to march at midnight; this deponent was honored with the command of the militia.

The troops marched agreeably to orders about two o'clock, and after proceeding to the towns they fell in with a party of Indians, (a battle ensued, the result of which is generally known;) as they returned, about one and a half miles before we got to camp. This deponent sent a horseman forward to inform the General what was done, and very shortly after he had despatched this horseman, met Major Ray, with about thirty men, who informed him there had come a horseman into camp, and had acquainted the General that the party was nearly all cut off, that the General had sent him with what men he could get out of the militia to meet what had escaped of the detachment, that those with him were all that would turn out; this deponent informed the Major otherwise, and requested him to wait until Major McMullen, Major Hall, and Major Ormsby should come up, that they were but a small distance behind, and he would go forward to the General. When this deponent arrived at camp and informed the General what was done, he appeared to be well satisfied; he also asked the General if he would not send back another party to keep possession of the battle ground? he replied, he would not divide his Army any more, when this deponent insisted on the whole Army's marching back, no person being present, except the General, Major Doughty, and this deponent; the General answered, You see the situation of the Army, we are now scarcely able to move our baggage, it will take up three days to go and return to this place, we have no more forage for our horses, and if the Indians intend to collect, which he apprehended they would, from their success on the 19th, it would give them a great opportunity; that they had got a very good scouring, and he would keep the Army in perfect readiness to receive them, should they think proper to follow; and finally concluded that under the present circumstances, it was best to move forward to Fort Washington, and if the Indians did follow, he would make every exertion in his power to defeat their intentions; Major Doughty appeared perfectly to agree with the General in opinion. The bounds of the camp were made less; the Army continued at the same camp until next morning, orders were given to march at the usual hour, which was eight o'clock; during this time this deponent never heard any person express a desire to go back to the towns, except two soldiers of Major Ray's party, by the names of Miller and Hammond. Next morning, at the hour appointed to march, the General moved with the front of the Army, and halted at a very small distance, litters not being ready for all the wounded. This deponent, with the rear guard, and many others, did not leave the camp until ten o'clock, when they moved on and joined the Army; the whole then proceeded on towards Fort Washington, with as much regularity as was observed in going out, until we came to the old Chillicothe on little Miami, when a number of militia, contrary to orders, fired off their guns. This deponent endeavored to put a stop to such disorderly behaviour; and commanded that those offenders that could be taken should be punished agreeably to general orders, and having caught a soldier himself in the very act of firing his gun, ordered a file of men to take him immediately and carry him to the six-pounder, and for the drummer to tie him up and give him six lashes. This deponent was shortly after met by Colonel Trotter and Major McMullen, and a number of militia soldiers, who in an abrupt manner asked him by what authority he ordered that soldier whipped? he replied, in support of general orders; on which a very warm dispute ensued between Colonel Trotter, Major McMullen, and this deponent. The General, being informed of what had happened came forward and gave Colonel Trotter and Major McMullen a very severe reprimand, ordered the Federal troops to parade, and the drummer to do his duty, swearing he would risk his life in support of his orders. The man received the number of lashes ordered, and several that were confined were set at liberty; numbers of the militia seemed much pleased with soon quashed, the Army intended mutiny being soon quashed, the Army proceeded in good order to Fort Washington. When the Army arrived at the mouth of Licking, the General informed this deponent he had determined to arrest some of the militia officers for their bad conduct, and send them home with disgrace; but this deponent opposed his intention, alleging that it would be a disgrace to the whole militia, that he would perhaps stand in need of their assistance on some future occasion, and it would sour their minds and cause them to turn out with reluctance, and that his discharging them generally with honor, perhaps would answer a better purpose; the General readily indulged the request of this deponent. This deponent further observes, that during the expedition he never heard officer nor soldier find fault, or give the most distant hint of being displeased with the General's conduct in any respect, nor charge him with cowardice or drunkenness, and expected the General had given general satisfaction; and what more confirmed his opinion, was after their arrival at Fort Washington, the General invited all the field and some other officers to dine with him, amongst whom was Colonel Trotter, Major Doughty, Major Hall, and Major McMullen. Dinner being over, wine was introduced; the General stepping out on some occasion, Major Hall proposed drinking his health, it was unanimously agreed to, and with as much cheerfulness as any other health that was proposed. This deponent continued at Fort Washington a few days after, and never heard any person speak a disrespectful word of General Harmar, or find fault in the least with his conduct whilst on the expedition. When this deponent returned home in Kentucky, hearing such reports respecting the expedition, was much amazed, but concluded it arose from a want of knowledge and proper information, or from prejudice. This deponent further saith, that he looked on General Harmar to be a very brave and experienced officer. And further saith not.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Message from the President of the United States, communicating the correspondence between the British Minister Plenipotentiary and the Secretary of State, in relation to the Commerce of the two countries.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have thought it proper to lay before you a communication of the 11th instant, from the Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain to the Secretary of State, relative to the Commerce of the two countries; together with their explanatory correspondence, and the Secretary of State's Letter to me on the subject.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

PHILADELPHIA, April 13, 1792.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you a communication from Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, covering a clause of a statute of that country relative to its Commerce with this, and notifying a determination to carry it into execution henceforward. Conceiving that the determination announced could not be really meant as extensively as the words import, I asked and received an explanation from the Minister, as expressed in the Letter and answer herein enclosed; and, on consideration of all circumstances, I cannot but confide in the opinion expressed by him, that its sole object is to exclude foreign vessels from the islands of Jersey and Guernsey.

The want of proportion between the motives expressed and the measure, its magnitude and consequences, total silence as to the proclamation on which the intercourse between the two countries has hitherto hung, and of which, in this broad sense, it would be a revocation, and the recent manifestations of the disposition of that Government to concur with this in mutual offices of friendship and good will, support his construction. The Minister, moreover, assured me verbally that he would immediately write to his Court for an explanation, and in the mean time is of opinion that the usual intercourse of Commerce between the two countries (Jersey and Guernsey excepted) need not be suspended.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most profound respect and attachment, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

The President of the U. S.

PHILADELPHIA, August 11, 1792.

SIR: I have received, by a circular despatch from my Court, directions to inform this Government that, considerable inconveniences having arisen from the importation of tobacco in foreign vessels into the ports of his Majesty's dominions, contrary to the act of the 12th Charles II, chapter 18, section 3, (commonly called the Navigation act,) it has been determined, in future, strictly to enforce this clause, of which I take the liberty of enclosing to you a copy.

And I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant.

Mr. JEFFERSON.

Act 12 Car. 2, Chap. 18, Sec. 3.

And it is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no goods or commodities whatsoever, of the growth, production, or manufacture of Africa, Asia, or America, or of any part thereof, which are described or laid down in the usual maps or charts of those places, be imported into England, Ireland, or Wales, islands of Guernsey and Jersey, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, in any other ship or ships, vessel or vessels whatsoever, but in such as do truly and without fraud, belong only to the people of England or Ireland, Dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, or of the lands, islands, plantations, or territories in Asia, Africa, or America, to his Majesty belonging, as the proprietors and right owners thereof, and whereof the master and three-fourths at least of the mariners are English, under the penalty of the forfeiture of all such goods and commodities, and of the ship or vessel in which they were imported, with all her guns, tackle, furniture, ammunition, and apparel—one moiety to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety to him or them who shall seize, inform, or sue for the same, in any Court of Record, by bill, information, plaint, or other action, wherein no essoin, protection, or wager of law, shall be allowed.

PHILADELPHIA, April 12, 1792.

SIR: I am this moment favored with the Letter you did me the honor of writing yesterday, covering the extract of a British statute forbidding the admission of foreign vessels into any ports of the British dominions, with goods or commodities of the growth, production, or manufacture of America. The effect of this appears to me so extensive, as to induce a doubt whether I understand rightly the determination to enforce it, which you notify, and to oblige me to ask of you whether we are to consider it as so far a revocation of the proclamation of your Government, regulating the Commerce between the two countries, and that henceforth no articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States are to be received in the ports of Great Britain or Ireland, in vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States?

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most perfect esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

The MINISTER Plenipotentiary

PHILADELPHIA, April 12, 1792.

SIR: In answer to your Letter of this day, I have the honor of observing, that I have no other instructions upon the subject of my communication than such as are contained in the circular despatch, of which I stated the purport in my Letter dated yesterday. I have, however, no difficulty in assuring you that the result of my personal conviction is, that the determination of his Majesty's Government to enforce the clause of the Act of Navigation, (a copy of which I transmitted to you,) with respect to the importation of commodities in foreign vessels, has originated in consequence of the many frauds that have taken place in the importation of tobacco into his Majesty's dominions, in foreign vessels, and is not intended to militate against the proclamation, or order of the King in Council, regulating the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States, which I have every reason to believe still exists in full force, as I have not had the most distant information of its being revoked.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect esteem and consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

Mr. JEFFERSON.

GEO. HAMMOND.

PETITION OF CATHARINE GREENE.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, to whom was referred a petition of Catharine Greene, of the 4th of March, 1790, respectfully submits the following Report thereupon:

The said petition seeks to obtain an indemnification from the United States against the effects of certain engagements which were entered into by the now deceased husband of the petitioner, the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, while commanding officer in the Southern Department; and, for the circumstances on which it is founded, refers to a representation, of the 22d of August, 1785, which was made by the said Gen. Greene to the United States in Congress assembled; a copy of which representation, marked A, is herewith submitted.

The following are the principal facts which appear in relation to this application:

1. The Department of War, in the Fall of the year 1782, authorized the said Major General Greene to obtain supplies of clothing for the troops under his command.

2. In consequence of this authority, in November or December of the same year, he entered into a contract for the supply of clothing to the Army with John Banks, a partner in the house of Hunt, er, Banks, & Co., who contracted on behalf of the company; and upon account of the contract advanced him eleven hundred guineas in money, and drew bills upon the Superintendent of Finance for the residue. This transaction was duly notified to the Department of War, and received the approbation of that department.

Petition of Catharine Greene.

3. The goods for completing this contract were purchased on credit by the contractors from certain British merchants then in Charleston.

4. About the same period, the Superintendent of Finance empowered General Greene to contract for the supply of all such provisions as might be wanted for the use of the Army, in the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia, with permission, if more convenient to him, to commit the execution of the business to Edward Carrington, Esq.; to whom it was accordingly committed.

5. An engagement which had been taken by the State of South Carolina, for the supply of the Army, was to expire at the end of the year 1782. It became urgent to complete a contract for the supply after that period. Advertisements for receiving proposals were published; and particular applications were made by General Greene to sundry characters of property and influence, who had been formerly men of business, to endeavor to engage them to enter into a competition for the contract. But these efforts did not produce the desired effect, owing partly to the distressed and deranged situation of the country, and partly to the then state of public credit. No offer was made, except by the same John Banks, who was the contractor for supplying the troops with clothing, acting on behalf of the same copartnership of Hunt, Banks, & Co. The terms proposed by him, being thought too disadvantageous, were not accepted in the first instance. The State of South Carolina having consented to extend its measures for supplying the Army to the 20th of February following, advantage was taken of the extension, to endeavor to procure better terms. A conclusion was delayed to give a further opportunity for other offers, and negotiations were carried on with Mr. Banks to induce him to moderate his terms. He fell somewhat in his demands; but as they still continued to be thought too high, Gen. Greene would not suffer a contract to be concluded till every possible effort to obtain more favorable terms had failed. As a last expedient for this purpose, a letter was written by the said Edward Carrington to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of South Carolina, stating the then situation of the business, and asking through him the opinion of the House, whether there was a probability of obtaining from any part of the country more advantageous terms; and whether it would be advisable, in the expectation of such an event, to keep open the contract for any longer period. It appears to have been an object of this letter, through the medium of that body, to excite, if possible, some further competition. But the end was not answered. The Speaker, in his reply, states that no competition had been excited in consequence of it, and that, though the terms proposed by Banks were thought too high, yet as no other proposals had been made, and as the pressing necessities of the Army called for immediate relief, it was deemed needless to keep open the contract any longer, under an idea that more advantageous propositions might be made. Under these circumstances, on the 18th of the same month of February, a contract with Hunt, Banks, & Co., was concluded, and was immediately after notified to the Superintendent of Finance.

6. It is stated by General Greene, in his representation to Congress, that the company's funds were inadequate to the execution of what they had undertaken; that bills sold greatly under par, and few could be sold at any rate; that the funds of which the company were possessed were tied up by prior engagements; that the creditors insisted on further security, before they would consent to an application of those funds for the support of the Army. That he was reduced to a choice of difficulties, either to turn the Army loose upon the country, or take upon himself the risk of supporting the contractors; that he chose the latter, as the least evil, and became bound for them to their creditors for a sum of upwards of thirty thousand pounds sterling; that to render the hazard as small as possible, he made the company give an order on their agent in Philadelphia, Mr. Pettit, for all the contract money and sums due upon the clothing department, to be paid into the hands of the persons whose debts he had guaranteed, and that one of the creditors was sent forward to receive them; but that these funds were diverted into other channels.

And it appears, in proof, that public bills were, as alleged, of very difficult sale, being subject to a discount of 15 per cent. for prompt payment, (as much as 25 being sometimes demanded;) that the Army, at the time when this engagement was entered into by General Greene, was in a very critical situation; that discontents, from various causes had produced several instances of actual mutiny; that if the contractors had failed, there was no ground to count on any other resource as a substitute, and if a want of provisions had been added to other causes of dissatisfaction, there was reason to apprehend a disbanding or dissolution of the Army. That General Greene, on or about the 8th of April, 1783, did become surety for the contractors, to different persons, in very considerable sums; and it is to be inferred, as well from the fact itself, as from the evidence, that the doing of it was necessary, by quieting their creditors, to enable them to proceed in the supply of the Army.

It further appears, in proof, that Mr. Burnet, one of the company, had informed Mr. Pettit, their agent, that they had purchased a quantity of goods from British merchants in Charleston; that these goods had enabled them to undertake for the supply of the Army in clothing and provisions; and that they had stipulated with those merchants, "that the moneys arising from the contract should be appropriated to the payment of the debt contracted by that purchase." That repeated instructions, by letter, in the name of the company—sometimes in the handwriting of Banks, and sometimes of Burnet—"uniformly held up to him (Mr.

Pettit) the idea of paying the produce of the contract to the same merchants, in proportion to their respective claims, of which they sent a list amounting to upwards of £32,000, due to three houses. That two payments, one for $32,875, and the other for $4,222, were made by him to the British merchants; that a Mr. Warrington, one of them, had come forward to Philadelphia to receive the money, both on his own account, and as an agent for others; but that, in consequence of subsequent arrangements and instructions, the residue of the contract money was diverted to other purposes.

7. Precautions were taken by General Greene, when he became apprised of his danger, to obtain counter security. This was actually effected to a considerable extent; but it seems now reduced to a certainty, that a loss of not less than eight thousand pounds sterling will be sustained by his estate, in consequence of the transaction, unless indemnified by the Government; and that the probable result will be the entire ruin of the estate.

8. No document appears, showing that the notice of his having become surety for the company, was ever given by General Greene to Congress, or any of the Public Departments, prior to his representations of the 22d August, 1785, claiming an indemnity in case of such eventual loss. The omission of such notice, is indeed to be inferred, from the silence of that representation on the point. The evidence of that foregoing fact is to be found in the documents herewith submitted, marked from A to Z inclusively.

Under this state of facts, it remains to be considered whether it be incumbent upon the Government of the United States to grant the indemnification to the estate of Major General Greene, which is sought by the petition.

Objections to such an indemnification might arise from three sources.

I. Want of authority from the Government to enter into the suretyship in question.

But this, it is conceived, would not be a valid objection. There certainly are numerous cases in which the commanding officer of an Army is justifiable in doing more than he has a regular authority to do, from the exigency of particular conjunctures. And where it appears that the unauthorized procedure was prudent and necessary in itself, and was warranted by motives sufficiently important and emergent, it is just and proper in the Government to ratify what has been done, and to indemnify the officer from injury on account of it. That an emergency of this kind did exist, to justify the measure which was adopted by General Greene, appears to be satisfactorily established. The keeping of the Army from disbanding, may be presumed, upon strong grounds of evidence, to have materially depended upon it. And there does not seem to have been a deficiency of precaution in guarding, as far as was practicable, against eventual loss.

II. A personal or private interest in doing what was foreign to the duties and relations of a commanding officer.

This, if it should exist, would be a decisive objection. The existence of it having been alleged, it remains to examine what probability there is of the allegation being well founded. Its source is traced to a letter of John Banks, containing a suggestion, or conjecture, that General Greene was, or probably would be, concerned in the co-partnership of Hunter, Banks, & Co.

But this circumstance loses all force from the following considerations:

1. From a letter, which General Greene wrote to John Banks, dated the 25th of December, 1782, in which the General makes his acknowledgments to Mr. Banks, for the services he had rendered to the Army, in respect to clothing, and invites him to become a competitor for supplying it with provisions. The scope and language of this letter strongly indicate that General Greene had then no interested connexion with Mr. Banks, in relation to any of the matters which are the subjects of it. As this conclusion results rather from the general tenor of the letter than from particular expressions, its justness will best appear by an insertion of the entire letter. It is in these words:

"HEADQUARTERS, Dec. 25, 1782.

"DEAR SIR: The comfortable condition in which you have put the Army, from the large supply of blankets and clothing furnished it, claims my particular acknowledgments; for although I expect the public will make you a reasonable compensation, yet as you were the only person who had the will and the means to serve us, our obligation is equally great. I am happy to find, also, that most if not all our officers are likely to get supplies of clothing through your agency. Col. Carrington, who is appointed to make the contracts for the subsistence of the Southern Army, also informs me your house have it in contemplation to engage in this business. Great as all our other obligations are, if you contract for the supplies of the Army, this will be greater than all the rest; for the present mode, in which we are supplied, is truly distressing, both to the people and to the Army. The manner of collecting, by military parties, renders it distressing to the citizens, and from the uncertain collections, the Army is often without anything to eat. This is hard upon troops who have bled so freely for an oppressed people. I must beg you to hasten your proposals; and I flatter myself you will, from your attachment to the cause, as well as a regard for the Army, serve the public on the lowest terms.

"I am, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

"NATH. GREENE.

"MR. JOHN BANKS."

2. From the pains taken by that officer to induce competition from other quarters; the delays which, with his participation and direction, attended an acceptance of the proposals made by Hunter, Banks, & Co., after the time for receiving proposals had expired, in order to afford a still further opportunity for other proposals, and to bring that company to more moderate terms; the reference which, in the last resort, was had to the Assembly of South Carolina, as the only remaining expedient for exciting a competition, which had in vain been sought by other means; and respecting which Colonel Carrington, in his affidavit, (document R.) expresses himself in these strong terms: "General Greene would not suffer a contract to be closed, without making every possible effort to excite a competition, and as a last resort, a letter was written to the Assembly of South Carolina, &c.; circumstances which satisfactorily prove that General Greene had, in the first instance, no common interest with Hunter, Banks, & Co., in the contract for supplying the Army with provisions.

3. From a letter of Mr. Forsyth, one of the partners, to General Greene, December 29th, 1782, (document F.) in which he thanks General Greene for a letter of approbation of his public conduct, and expresses a hope of that countenance and aid from the General, in private life, which he had enjoyed while serving under his command; and then proceeds to mention the case of a brig, belonging to the company, which had been seized at Savannah, and asks, as a favor, a letter from the General to the Judge before whom the cause of the vessel was expected to be tried, to remove a prejudice against Mr. Banks, (as being a person inimical to the American cause,) which, it was feared, might occasion her condemnation. The style of this letter is the reverse of that of one part-ner writing to another, on a subject of mutual interest. It is that of a person who had received favors from a patron, asking a further favor.

4. From the counter-securities which General Greene took, in consequence of his having become surety for the company, to their creditors; one being a bond, from Banks, Patton, and Hunter, three of the partners, bearing date the 7th of May, 1783, (document M.) in which it is acknowledged, as is usual in such cases, that General Greene had no concern in the debts for which he had become bound; and the parties accordingly engage to exonerate him from those debts, or any damages which might arise from his becoming security for them: another being an assignment from Robert Forsyth, another of the partners, to General Greene, bearing date the 2d of September, 1784, (document N.) of debts due to the partnership, as a counter-security to him; in which it is stated, that General Greene, at the special instance and request of the company, had become their security to certain persons, to whom they were indebted. The latter, however, being a considerable time after the transaction, is far less conclusive than the former.

5. From the affidavits of John Banks and James Hunter, two of the partners, one dated the 3d of January, 1783, (document O.) the other 26th of September, 1785, (document P.); the first, denying explicitly all connexion of General Greene in the affairs of the company; the last, declaring that the deponent never considered General Greene as directly or indirectly interested in the purchase of the goods upon which the debts for which he had become bound, appear to have been founded: that this purchase was on the proper account of John Banks, Robert Forsyth, Ichabod Burnet, John Ferrie, Robert Patton, and the deponent; and that he never heard nor understood, from either of the other partners, that General Greene was any way concerned or interested in that purchase. There is also a certificate from Robert Forsyth, of the 3d of March, 1785, (document Q.) declaring that the General was not interested, either in that purchase, or in the contract for the Army.

6. From a suit in Chancery, which was brought by General Greene, and after his death prosecuted by his executors to a recovery, against John Ferrie, one of the partners of the house of Hunter, Banks, & Co.; which suit, it appears, might have been defeated by proof of interest in the partnership, on the part of General Greene; but not only no such proof was made, but it is asserted on oath, by Charles C. Pinckney, (document Y.) who was solicitor and counsel for Ferrie, and who professes to have obtained, in a professional capacity, considerable knowledge of their affairs, that Ferrie had assisted Banks in the purchase of the goods in question, had been instrumental in his obtaining credit, had kept the books of the company, and appeared to have known all the concerns of the company most intimately and minutely; that if General Greene had been concerned in the speculation, he (Ferrie) must have known it, and that, knowing it, he would have made it known. That he was under no obligation to conceal it, having been put at defiance by the suit, and could he have proved the fact, he would have been successful in his defence; but he neither produced one tittle of evidence, nor deduced a single circumstance to show, that the General had, in any manner, been concerned in the purchase. The consequence of which was, that the bill was sustained, the lands were decreed to be sold, and after defraying the expenses of the suit, and discharging the money due on a mortgage which had been given by a prior owner, the balance of the sale was directed to be paid over into the hands of the complainant, towards an indemnification of the General. This statement has peculiar force, especially as the General, by commencing the suit, exposed himself to the hazard, if any connexion of the interest had subsisted, either of being defeated, by a discovery of that connexion, on oath, upon a cross bill, or of perjury, in the concealment and denial of it.

7. From a certificate (document X.) of the two Chancellors of South Carolina, which, after stating the insinuations that had been made of General Greene's connexion with Hunter, Banks, & Co., proceeds thus:

"We think ourselves authorized to say, that we are as competent to his vindication, from any aspersion of that nature, as any two persons in the State of South Carolina, as we were both in the Executive Department at the time of the evacuation of this capital—the one, Governor, and the other Lieutenant Governor—and a suit in Chancery has since been brought to issue before us as Chancellors, in the prosecution of which, the several grounds, principles, and obligations of the various connexions or copartnerships, by whom the respective speculations alluded to were entered into, were very fully, ably, and minutely discussed, by some of the most eminent solicitors in the Court. And we have no hesitation, in the most unequivocal, unreserved, and unequivocal manner, to declare, that we never had, from our own observation, or from the strictest and most scrutinizing investigation on the Chancery bench, the most distant reason to conceive, that the Honorable General Greene was ever, either directly or indirectly, engaged in any of the aforesaid speculations, any further than as surety for Mr. Banks. We think ourselves warranted also in asserting, that the contract with Mr. Banks, for the supply of the Army, was the most advantageous he could obtain, at a time when the want of provisions threatened a mutiny.

"JOHN MATHEWS,
"RICHARD HUTSON.

"CHARLESTON, October 30, 1790."

8. From the concurrent opinions of other respectable characters, who had the best opportunities of judging of circumstances, that General Greene was totally unconnected in interest with that company. On this point, the documents S, T, U, V, W, Z, are interesting; that marked V, states several particulars as argumentative of the opinion expressed, which merit particular attention.

From the foregoing circumstances combined, there is conceived to be conclusive evidence in that General Greene was not interested, either in the purchase of the goods, which had created the debts afterwards guaranteed by him, nor in either of the contracts for clothing or provisions; was not a partner in the house of Hunter, Banks, & Co., nor had any concern whatever in the affairs of that company further than as surety.

There is nothing to oppose these conclusions, but the suggestion in Banks's letter, and the fact of the suretyship. The former is obviated by the contradiction, on oath, of the party himself; and the circumstances of this contradiction, as represented by General Wayne and Colonel Carrington, in their affidavits, (documents T and S,) give it every possible appearance of genuineness. A question naturally arises, What could have been the inducement to the suggestion made by Banks? This is answered by Colonel Carrington, who represents him as a man of "excessive vanity, much disposed to make a show of connexions with high characters." It is also possible that he may have expected to derive advantage from the reputation of such a connexion. The observation, moreover, is of great force, that if General Greene had been a secret partner, unknown to the partners in general, Banks's character precludes the supposition that he would have been the selected depository of the secret.

The fact of the suretyship is accounted for, by the necessity of the measure, as it related to the situation of the Army; and relying on the appropriation of the funds, which should arise out of the contracts with the public, to the payment of the persons to whom he had become bound, it was natural that he should have considered the risk as not very great.

This full statement of the circumstances, which are conceived to exculpate General Greene from the imputation of being concerned in the transaction, has appeared not only essential to placing the merits of the subject properly before the House, but a debt due to the memory of an officer who had rendered essential service to his country; and of a man who, by a life of probity, had secured to himself the strongest of all titles to a candid construction of his conduct.

It remains to advert to the third source of objection which had been intimated, as capable of bringing into question the propriety of an indemnification—namely, the omission of notice to the Government, at or about the time of the transaction, that the suretyship in question had been entered into.

Here, in the judgment of the Secretary, lies the only difficulty which attends the question of indemnification.

It appears to have been incumbent upon General Greene, if he meant to look to the Government for indemnification, in case of eventual loss, to have given early notice of the step he had taken. In proportion as that step was unauthorized or unusual, the necessity for the communication was increased. It seems to be a matter of obvious propriety, that a public officer, who expects the sanction of the Government to an unauthorized proceeding—especially an indemnification against pecuniary loss, on account of it—ought to embrace the first convenient opportunity to make known the object for which such sanction and indemnification are desired. And the motives on the part of the Government to require a due observance of that precaution, are of great force in regard to the security of the public. It is necessary, to enable the Government to investigate the circumstances, at the time, when the truth can best be discovered, and unfounded pretensions best be detected. And where an indemnification against pecuniary loss is expected, a prompt disclosure is necessary to put the Government in a condition to take care of its own interests, in the manner which shall appear to itself most efficacious.

It is, indeed, to be observed, that General Greene was naturally led to imagine that all hazard in the affair was obviated by the measures which had been taken to secure, as he supposed, an application of the moneys to be received from the public, on account of the contract, to the payment of the debts for which he had become surety, and therefore omitted a communication to the Government, as not necessary to his safety.

But whether this, which appears to be a satisfactory explanation of the motive for the omission, which did take place, be also a sufficient ground for dispensing with the observance of a precaution which, as a general rule, would be proper to be made a condition of indemnification; or how far the peculiar merit of the officer, or the peculiar hardship and misfortune of the case, may render advisable a deviation from that rule, are points which the Secretary begs leave to submit, without observation, to the contemplation of Legislative discretion.

If a direct indemnification should be conceived inadmissible, as a public precedent, a question would still present itself, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the family of Gen. Greene ought to be left to the ruinous consequences of an act, which was dictated by a well-advised zeal for the public service, because he omitted a precaution which the rules of public policy may require to have been observed.

The Secretary is not certain, whether an opinion on this point be within the province assigned him by the reference, which is the subject of this Report, and he therefore forbears an explicit sentiment. He hopes, however, to be thought justified by the occasion, when he permits himself to observe, that strong and extraordinary motives of national gratitude for the very signal and very important services rendered by General Greene to his country, must serve to give a keener sting to the regret which ought ever to attend the necessity of a strict adherence to maxims of public policy, in opposition to claims founded on useful acts of zeal for the public service, if no means of protecting from indigence and penury the family of that most meritorious officer shall, upon examination, be found admissible.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the Honorable the Senate and the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled; the petition of Catharine Greene, relict of the late General Greene, humbly sheweth:

That the object on which her petition is founded is generally stated in the representation hereto annexed, made by her late husband to the United States in Congress assembled, on the 22d day of August, 1785.

That it will appear, by the said representation, that it was the intention of her late husband to have ascertained the loss on the transaction therein stated, previously to his making application to the United States for indemnification; and in pursuit of this intention, he instituted suits for the recovery of the bonds and mortgages by him received from Messrs. Banks and Company, as collateral securities; but his designs in this and all other earthly respects were frustrated by his untimely death.

That the suits for the recovery of the said bonds and other collateral securities have been protracted by the death of the debtors, and various other circumstances entirely without the control of your petitioner.

That while the recovery of the said bonds and other collateral securities are placed at a future distant period, and their amount uncertain, not only the estates conferred on her late husband, by the munificent gratitude of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, but his paternal estate, will be legally wrested from your petitioner and her children, in order to satisfy those obligations which her late husband was constrained to enter into for the public service; whereby your petitioner, and her helpless children, will be exposed to all the bitter effects of poverty.

That your petitioner thus brings forward her situation, and that of her children, with the firmest hope and expectation that the United States will, after a full examination into the transaction stated in her late husband's representation, grant her effectual relief, by assuming the payment of the said obligations entered into for the benefit of the United States; or in such other manner, save her and her children's estate from impending ruin.

as in the judgment of Congress shall appear meet and proper.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall continue to pray.

CATHARINE GREENE.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, December 3, 1792.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

November 30, 1792.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a Report, pursuant to two resolutions of the House of Representatives, one of the 21st instant, respecting the redemption of the Public Debt; the other of the 22d instant, respecting the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated; and to be, with the most perfect respect, sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
of the House of Representatives.

In obedience to two resolutions of the House of Representatives, one of the 21st instant, directing the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY to Report a plan for the redemption of so much of the Public Debt, as by the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," the United States have reserved the right to redeem; the other, of the 22d instant, directing him to Report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States:"—the said SECRETARY respectfully submits the following Report:

The expediency of taking measures for the regular redemption of the Public Debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government, being wisely predetermined, by the resolution of the House of Representatives referring the subject to the Secretary, nothing remains for him, but to endeavor to select and submit the most eligible means of providing for the execution of that important object.

With this view, the first inquiry which naturally presents itself, is, whether the existing revenues are, or are not, adequate to the purpose?

The estimates which accompany the Report of the Secretary of the 14th instant,* will show that, during the continuance of the present Indian war, the appropriations for interest and the demands for the current service are likely to exhaust the product of the existing revenues; though they afford a valuable surplus beyond the permanent objects of expenditure, which it is hoped, may ere long be advantageously applied to accelerate the extinguishment of the Debt.

In the mean time, however, and until the restoration of peace, the employment of that resource, in this way, must of necessity be suspended; and either the business of redemption must be deferred, or recourse must be had to other expedients.

But did no such temporary necessity, for resorting to other expedients, exist, the doing of it would still be recommended by weighty considerations. It would appear, in the abstract, advisable, to leave the surplus of the present revenues free, to be applied to such casual exigencies as may from time to time occur, to occasional purchases of the Debt when not exhausted by such exigencies, to the payment of interest on any balances, which may be found due to particular States, upon the general settlement of accounts, and finally to the payment of interest on the deferred part of the Debt, when the period for such payment arrives. There is a reasonable prospect, that if not diverted it will be found adequate to the two last important purposes.

Relinquishing then the idea of an immediate application of the present revenues to the object in view, it remains to examine what other modes are in the option of the Legislature.

Loans, from time to time, equal to the sums annually redeemable, and borrowed on the same interest upon those sums, offer themselves as one expedient, which may be employed with a degree of advantage. As there is a probability of borrowing at a lower rate of interest, a material saving would result; and even this resource, if none better could be devised, ought not to be neglected.

But it is obvious, that to rely upon this resource alone would be to do little towards the final extinction of the nation. To stop at that point would consequently be neither provident nor satisfactory. The interests as well as the expectations of the Union require something more effectual.

The establishment of additional revenues is the remaining resource. This, if the business is to be undertaken in earnest, is unavoidable. And a full confidence may reasonably be entertained, that the community will see with satisfaction the employment of those means, which alone can be effectual, for accomplishing an end, in itself so important, and so much an object of general desire. It cannot fail to be universally felt that if the end is to be attained, the necessary means must be employed.

It can only be expected that care be taken to choose such as are liable to fewest objections, and that in the modifications of the business in other respects, due regard be had to the present and progressive circumstances of the country.

Assuming it as the basis of a plan of redemption, that additional revenues are to be provided, the further inquiry divides itself into the following branches:

I. Shall a revenue be immediately constituted, equal to the full sum which may at present be redeemed, according to the terms of the contract?

II. Shall a revenue be constituted from year to year, equal only to the interest of the sum to be redeemed in each year, coupling with this operation an annual Loan, commensurate with such sum? or,

III. Shall a revenue be constituted each year so much exceeding the interest of the sum to be redeemed, as to be sufficient, within a short definite term of time, to discharge the principal itself; coupling with this operation also, an annual Loan, equal to the sum to be annually redeemed, and appropriating the revenue created to its discharge, within the term which shall have been predetermined?

The first plan, besides being completely effectual, would be eventually most economical; but considering to what a magnitude the revenues of the United States have grown in a short period, it is not easy to pronounce how far the faculty of paying might not be strained by any sudden considerable augmentation, wheresoever immediately placed; while the rapid progress of the country in population and resource seems to afford a moral certainty, that the necessary augmentation may be made with convenience, by successive steps, within a moderate term of time; and invites to temporary and partial suspensions, as capable of conciliating the reasonable accommodation of the community with the vigorous prosecution of the main design. For these and for other reasons which will readily occur, the course of providing immediately the entire sum to be redeemed, is conceived not to be the most eligible.

The second plan, though much more efficacious than that of annual Loans borrowed on the revenues now appropriated for the payment of interest on the sums to be redeemed, does not appear to be sufficiently efficacious. The schedule A will show the effect of it to the 1st of January, 1802, when the Deferred Debt will become redeemable in the proportions stipulated. Supposing the investment of the interest which is each year liberated, together with that which has been, and will be released by purchases, pursuant to provisions heretofore made, in the purchase of six per cent. stock; a sum of principal equal to $2,043,837 07 would be sunk, and a clear annuity, equal to $459,212 82 would be created, toward further redemptions; but the fund then necessary for the future progressive redemption of the Debt, according to the right reserved, would be $1,126,616 44, exceeding by $667,403 62, the amount of the redeeming fund. Something more effectual than this is certainly desirable, and appears to be practicable.

The last of the three plans best accords with the most accurate view, which the Secretary has been able to take of the public interest.

In its application, it is of material consequence to endeavor to accomplish these two points:

1st. The complete discharge of the sums annually redeemable, within the period prefixed, and the reimbursement, within the same period, of all auxiliary Loans, which may have been made for that purpose.

2d. The constituting, by the expiration of that period, a clear annual fund competent to the future redemption of the Debt, to the extent of the right reserved.

The period, to which it is conceived the plan ought to refer, that is, January 1st, 1802; because then the first payment, on account of the principal of the Deferred Debt, may rightfully be made.

In conformity to these ideas, the following plan is most respectfully submitted; premising, that the sum redeemable for the first year of the six per cent. stock, bearing a present interest, is computed at $550,000.

Let an annual fund be constituted during the present session, equal to $103,199 06, and to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1793. Let the sum of $550,000 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1799. The sum borrowed to be applied, on 1st of January, 1794, to the first payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed with interest, by the 1st of January, 1799, and will thenceforth, be free for any further application.

The sum redeemable the second year, that is, January 1, 1795, is computed at $583,000.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the second session after the present, equal to $109,391 60, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1794. Let the sum of $583,000 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1800. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1795, to the second payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1800, and will be thenceforth free for any further application.

The sum redeemable the third year, that is, January 1, 1796, is computed at $617,980.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the third session after the present, equal to $115,955 17, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1795. Let the sum of $617,980 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1801. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1796, to the third payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum redeemable the fourth year, that is, January 1st, 1797, is computed at $655,038 80.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the fourth session after the present, equal to $122,912 48, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1796. Let the sum of $655,038 80, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1797, to the fourth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the fifth year, that is, January 1st, 1798, is computed at $694,362 33.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the fifth session after the present, equal to $159,743 12, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1797. Let the sum of $694,362 33, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within four years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1798, to the fifth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the sixth year, that is, January 1st, 1799, is computed at $736,024 07.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the sixth session after the present, equal to $197,680 20, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1798. Let the sum of $736,024 07, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within three years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1799, to the sixth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum redeemable the seventh year, that is, January 1st, 1800, is computed at $780,185 52.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the seventh session after the present, equal to $272,848 38, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1799. Let the sum of $780,185 52, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within two years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1800, to the seventh payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum redeemable the eighth year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1801, is computed at $826,996 65.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the eighth session after the present, equal to $423,583 64, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1800. Let the sum of $826,996 65, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within one year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1801, to the eighth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, on the 1st of January, 1802. The sum redeemable the ninth year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1802, is computed at $1,126,616 44.

The then existing means for the discharge of this sum, arising from the operation of the plan, will be—

1st. The amount of the annuity constituted the third year, which will have been liberated by reimbursement of the third Loan.

2d. The arrears of interest not previously appropriated, and which are computed at $200,000.

There will consequently be a deficiency this year of $810,661 27, which will require to be supplied.

The Public Debt.

plied by a temporary Loan, to be reimbursed out of the surplus of the fund which, on the 1st of January, 1802, will exist for future redemptions, and which surplus will be sufficient to reimburse this temporary Loan in about thirteen years and a half.

It may be proper to remark, that this deficiency upon one year is suffered to exist, to avoid an unnecessary augmentation of revenue, materially beyond the sum permanently requisite. No inconvenience ensues, because this temporary deficiency is made up by the surplus of the permanent fund, within the period mentioned. And that fund, from the 1st of January, 1802, is adequate to all future redemptions, in the full proportion permitted by the contract.

The table in the schedule B, herewith submitted, will show in one view, the principles and operation of this plan.

The schedule C, will exhibit the means of constituting the several annuities proposed to be established. From it, will be seen, that the proposed annuities are to be composed partly of taxes to be successively laid, at the respective periods of creating them, partly of the surplus dividend to be expected on the stock belonging to the Government, in the Bank of the United States, beyond the interest to be paid on account of it, and partly of the funds heretofore pledged for the payment of interest, which will have been liberated upon so much of the Debt as will have been extinguished.

The respective amounts of the taxes to be severally laid, will be—

In the 1st year,	$ 43,199 06
In the 2d year,	109,391 60
In the 3d year,	115,955 17
In the 4th year,	102,912 48
In the 5th year,	102,743 12
In the 6th year,	107,680 20
In the 7th year,	109,649 32
Making together,	$691,530 95

The sum which will have been redeemed prior to the 1st day of January, 1802, will be $5,443,607 37. The sum redeemable on the 1st of January, 1802, will be $1,126,616 44; and the fund, which will thenceforth exist for the purpose of future redemption, as is particularly shown by the schedule D, will be $1,210,744 34; exceeding the sum strictly necessary by $84,127 90; a fund, which including the interest from year to year liberated, will, as already intimated, be completely adequate to the final redemption of the whole amount of six per cent. stock, as well the deferred as that bearing a present interest, according to the right which has been reserved for that purpose.

In the meantime, a further impression will be made upon the Debt by the investment of the residue of the funds, heretofore established, in the purchase of it; and it is hoped that the restoration of peace with the Indians will enable the application of the surplus of the existing revenues, together with the proceeds of the ceded lands in our Western Territory, to the same object. These, whenever they can be brought into action, will be important aids, materially accelerating the ultimate redemption of the entire Debt. The employment of these resources, when it can be done, by increasing the interest fund, will proportionably lessen the necessity of using the resource of taxation for creating the proposed annuities, if the Government shall judge it advisable to avail itself of the substitute which may accrue from that circumstance.

Having now given a general view of the plan, which has appeared upon the whole the most eligible, it is necessary in the next place to present to the consideration of the House the requisite funds for commencing the execution of it. These will embrace a provision for the first annuity only; that alone requiring, by the plan, immediate provision. With regard to a provision for the subsequent annuities, which is proposed to be successive, the Secretary will content himself with this general observation, that he discerns no intrinsic difficulty in making provision for them, as fast as shall be necessary, with due convenience to the people, and consistently with the idea of abstaining from taxing lands and buildings, (with the stock and implements of farms,) reserving them as a resource for those great emergencies, which call for a full exertion of all the contributive faculties of a country.

The following means for constituting the first annuity, are respectfully submitted, viz: Annual surplus of the dividend on the stock of Government in the Bank of the United States, beyond the interest to be paid out of the said dividend, estimated at $60,000.

Tax on horses, kept or used for the purpose of riding, or of drawing any coach, chariot, phaeton, chaise, chair, sulkey, or other carriage, for conveyance of persons; excepting and exempting all horses which are usually and chiefly employed for the purposes of husbandry, or in drawing wagons, wains, drays, carts, or other carriages, for the transportation of produce, goods, merchandise, and commodities, or in carrying burdens, in the course of the trade or occupation of the persons to whom they respectively belong, and the horses of persons in the military service of the United States, viz: For every horse, not above excepted and exempted, at the rate of one dollar per annum, where only one is used or kept by the same person; with an addition of fifty cents per annum per horse, where more than one and not more than two horses are kept or used by the same person; with an addition of one dollar per annum per horse where more than two, and not more than four are kept or used by the same person; and with an addition of one dollar and a half per horse, per annum, where more than four are kept or used by the same person: Provided, That this addition shall not be made in respect to horses usually employed in public stages, for the conveyance of passengers.

This progressive increase of rates on the higher numbers, has reference to the presumption of greater wealth, which arises from the possession of such higher numbers.

The product of this tax will probably be about equal to the residue of the proposed annuity, which is $43,199 06. How near the truth this estimate may prove, experiment alone can, in so untried a case, decide. An aid to this fund may be derived from the surplus dividend on the Bank stock, for the half year ending the last of December next, which it is presumed will be not less than twenty thousand dollars. Should a deficiency appear upon trial, it can be supplied by a future provision.

Proper regulations for the collection of this tax will, it is believed, be found not difficult, if the tax itself shall be deemed eligible. Its simplicity has been a considerable recommendation of it. Qualified as it is, it is not likely to fall on any but such who can afford to pay it. The exemption from the tax, in regard to horses which are appropriated to the purposes of husbandry, or of any trade or occupation, or to the transportation of commodities, seems to obviate all reasonable objection.

If, however, there should appear to the Legislature, reasons for preferring a tax on carriages for pleasure—which, it may be observed, will operate on nearly the same description of persons—the sum required may, it is believed, be produced from the following arrangement of rates, viz: Upon every coach, the annual sum of four dollars; upon every chaise, the annual sum of three dollars; upon every other carriage for the conveyance of persons, having four wheels, the annual sum of two dollars; and upon every chair, sulkey, or other carriage, for the conveyance of persons, having less than four wheels, the annual sum of one dollar.

The collection of this tax will be as simple and easy, and perhaps more certain, than that which has been primarily submitted.

With regard to the second object referred to the Secretary, namely, the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated, the following is respectfully submitted, to wit: That power be given by law to borrow the sum due, to be applied to that reimbursement: and that so much of the dividend on the stock of the Government in the Bank as may be necessary, be appropriated for paying the interest of the sum to be borrowed.

From this operation, it is obvious that a saving to the Government will result, equal to the difference between the interest which will be payable on the new Loan and that which is payable on the sum now due to the Bank. If the proposed Loan can be effected at the rate of those last made in Holland, the nett saving to the Government may be computed at the annual sum of $35,000; which saving, whatever it may be, is contemplated as part of the means for constituting the proposed annuities.

The benefit of this arrangement will be accelerated, if provision be made for the application of the proceeds of any Loans heretofore obtained, to the payment suggested, on the condition of replacing the sums which may be so applied out of the proceeds of the Loan or Loans which shall be made pursuant to the power above proposed to be given.

It will also conduce to the general end in view, if the Legislature shall think proper, to authorize the investment of the funds destined for the purchase of the Debt, in purchases of six per cent. stock, at the market price, though above par. The comparative prices of the several kinds of stock have been, and frequently may be, such as to render it more profitable to make investments in the six per cents. than in any other species of stock.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 3, 1793.
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

* The continuing necessities of the Colony of St. Domingo will call for further supplies. A decree of the National Assembly of France, of the 26th of June, 1792, contemplates a supply from the United States of 4,000,000 livres, or $726,000.

† Provision has been made for the payment of the principal part of the interest of this Debt, at Paris, according to stipulation. Interest upon the whole ceased on the 1st of January, 1793.
The residue of the sum drawn for is applicable to the purchase of the Public Debt. These remains to be received, according to the terms of sale, $632,132 02.

REMARKS.

The bills drawn from the 15th December, 1790, to June, 1791, inclusively, have been sold at 36 4-11 ninetieths of a dollar per guilder, payable in sixty days, or in ninety, with interest for thirty days. Those drawn in October and November, 1791, have been sold at the same rate of exchange for cash, or on a credit not exceeding ninety days, the purchaser paying interest for the whole term of the credit. The terms upon which the bills in April, 1792, have been disposed of were a credit of six months; the first two months without interest, and the last four months with an allowance of six per cent. by the purchaser, the rate of exchange as before. In July, August, and October, 1792, the rate of exchange was forty cents and seven mills per guilder, one moiety to be paid in two, and the other moiety in four months, with interest from the time of each sale. In November and December, 1792, the exchange was 36 4-11 ninetieths of a dollar.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, January 11, 1793.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1793.

Sir: The resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th of December last having been considered as contemplating Foreign Loans only, the statements rendered to the House on the 3d instant, were confined merely to those objects.

But, lest a greater latitude should have been intended by that resolution, I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a supplementary statement, No. V., which contains the several sums that have been borrowed in the United States, under the authority of the President; and to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.
The Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

No. V.

A statement of the moneys which have been borrowed in the United States, by the Government, and applied pursuant to several acts of Congress.

Under the act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1790," the following sums were borrowed from the Bank of New York, and applied as specified in the said act, viz:

1790, March 31, $30,000
April 8, 25,000

55,000, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the respective dates mentioned, to the 14th May, 1790, when the Loan was reimbursed.

Pursuant to the act, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," a Loan has been obtained from the Bank of the United States, agreeably to a contract with the said Bank, dated the 25th of May, 1792, of $523,000* at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States; upon which Loan there has been received in the Treasury, in the following instalments, and applied to the purpose for which it was appropriated—

100,000 1st of July, 1792.
100,000 1st of August, 1792.
100,000 1st of September, 1792.†

The interest accruing on the said instalments to the 1st of January, 1793, was made payable on that day, and thenceforth, until the reimbursement of the principal, the interest on the whole is to be paid half-yearly, namely, on the 1st of July and on the 1st of January, in each year.

The surplus of the duties laid by the act before mentioned, to be applied, as the same shall accrue, to the reimbursement of the principal and interest.

Pursuant to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," a Loan has been made, by the said Bank to the United States, of $2,000,000, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, reimbursable in ten years, by equal annual instalments, or at any time sooner, or in any greater proportions that the Government may think fit.

This Loan has been applied as directed by the act under which it was borrowed.

The time when the interest commenced on $1,000,000 of the said Loan, is coincident with the time when the dividend upon the stock of the Bank began to accrue, namely: the 20th of December, 1791. Upon the remaining $1,000,000, interest commenced on the 1st of July, 1792.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1793.
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 18, 1793.]

The Senate passed the following order, January 15, 1793:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate the account of the United States with the Bank of the United States, specifying the precise sums, with the dates of the debits and credits, from the institution of the Bank to the day the return is made.

That the Secretary of the Treasury also lay before the Senate, an account of the surplus of revenue appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt to the same period, specifying the sums and dates. That he lay before the Senate, a statement of the money borrowed by virtue of the law passed August the 4th, 1790, with the appropriation of the amount, and the precise dates.

That he lay before the Senate the amount and application of the money borrowed by virtue of the law of August the 12th, 1790.

* Errata.—The true sum, agreeably to contract, was $523,500.

† This sum was not received till the 28th of September.

Loans and Finances.

And that he also lay before the Senate, an account exhibiting the probable surplus, and unappropriated revenue of the year 1792, stating, as far as possible, the dates and the sums.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1793.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, pursuant to the order of the Senate of yesterday, the following documents, viz:

Books Nos. 1 and 2,* containing the current cash account between the United States and the Bank of the United States, from the commencement of the operations of that institution until this day.

A. Containing a series of accounts beginning the 16th of June, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing the cash account of the United States with the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Bank of the United States at Boston.

B. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 23d of May, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing the cash account of the United States with the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Bank of the United States at New York.

C. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 9th of August, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing similar accounts with the Office of Discount and Deposit at Baltimore.

D. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 9th of June, and ending the 22d of December, 1792, showing similar cash accounts with the Office of Discount and Deposit at Charleston.

Statement E, being an abstract of the balances remaining in the several Offices of Discount and Deposit, at the respective periods of the last returns.

Statements AB and Nos. 1, 2, 3, being accounts of the sales of bills on Amsterdam, by the Bank of the United States, and the several offices of Discount and Deposit.

These documents fulfill the first object of the order above mentioned.

Statement F, showing the surplus of revenue appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt. This surplus arose at the end of the year 1790, and was appropriated by an act of the 12th of August, 1790.

This fulfils the second object of the order, as I understand its meaning.

Statements (printed) Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4.†

These have been heretofore presented to the House of Representatives, and show, with as much detail and accuracy as is now in the power of the Treasury, the different Loans which have been made pursuant to the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, and their application, as far as it has gone.

These Loans having been contracted in virtue of the powers communicated by both acts, without particular reference to either, a specification of the Loans made upon each is, of course, not practicable. This mode of proceeding was indicated first, by an intimation from our bankers in Holland that a distinction might prove an embarrassment, (being a novelty, the reason of which would not be obvious to the money-lenders.) Secondly, by the consideration that, if the Loans were made upon both acts indiscriminately, their application could be regulated as circumstances, from time to time, should render advisable.

These documents fulfil, as far as is practicable, the third and fourth objects of the order.

Statement G, showing the probable unappropriated surplus of the public revenue during the year 1792. This fulfils, as far as can now be done, the last of the objects comprised in the order of the Senate. But, by way of explanation, I beg leave to refer to the printed statement D, which accompanied the estimate for the service of the present year, reported to the House of Representatives on the 14th of November last, and which is herewith transmitted.

The books Nos. 1 and 2, the papers contained in the files A, B, C, and D, and those marked AB, Nos. 1, 2, 3, are originals. They are sent, rather than transcripts, to avoid delay, as it is understood that the statements called for have reference to the deliberations of the Senate on the bill making appropriations for the service of the current year.

I suppose it would be most agreeable to the Senate to be enabled, as soon as possible, by the receipt of the information they have required, to proceed to a decision on that important subject; and, exposed as I am to very perplexing dilemmas, for the want of the requisite appropriations, in consequence of arrangements which it was my duty to enter into, to be able to keep pace with the exigencies of the public service, I could not but feel a solicitude to hasten the communication.

As the originals which have been mentioned are necessary documents of office, I request that the Senate will be pleased to cause them to be returned as soon as they shall have answered the purpose for which they have been required. With the most perfect respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.
The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

* "Books Nos. 1 and 2," and "files A, B, C, D," were returned, and are not now to be found.

† For these statements, see preceding tables.

A statement showing the probable surplus of the revenue of the United States, for the year 1792.

Nett product of duties on imports and tonnage, from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1792, as estimated (a)	$3,900,000 00
Nett products of duties on home-made spirits, as estimated	400,000 00
	4,300,000 00
APPROPRIATIONS.
Interest on the Public Debt for the year 1792	$2,849,194 73
For the support of Government for the same year, appropriated by the act of the 23d of December, 1791	600,000 00
Towards carrying into execution the act, entitled "An act making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers," appropriated by the act of the 2d of May, 1792	523,500 00
To defray any expense incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, appropriated by the act of the 8th of May, 1792	50,000 00
Surplus	4,022,694 73
	277,305 27

(a) This sum is estimated by adding to the ascertained product of the year 1791, an ascertained excess of product of the first two quarters of the year 1792, beyond the product of the first two quarters of the year 1791, being $252,319 11, and the estimated product for a half year, of the additional duties on imports, laid during the last session of Congress, and commencing on the 1st of July last, being $261,750. According to the information hitherto received at the Treasury, there is every probability that the amount of the duties for the last half year of 1792, will fully equal this calculation of their product, if in the ratio of the first half year, will exceed it.

LOANS.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, February 4, 1793.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.

Wednesday, January 23, 1793.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of the authorities under which Loans have been negotiated, pursuant to the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, together with copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause this House to be furnished with the names of the persons by whom and to whom the respective payments of the French Debt have been made in France, pursuant to the act for that purpose; specifying the dates of the respective drafts upon the Commissioners in Holland, and the dates of the respective payments of the Debt: A similar statement is requested respecting the Debts to Spain and Holland.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account, exhibiting, half-monthly, the balances between the United States and the Bank of the United States, including the several Branch Banks, from the commencement of those institutions to the end of the year 1792.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of all moneys which may have come into the Sinking Fund, from the commencement of that institution to the present time; specifying the particular fund from which they have accrued, and exhibiting, half-yearly, the sums uninvested, and where deposited.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the balance of all unapplied revenues at the end of the year 1792; specifying whether in money or bonds, and noting where the money is deposited: That he also make report of all unapplied moneys which may have been obtained by the several Loans authorized by law, and where such moneys are now deposited.

Report of the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in pursuance of the foregoing resolutions:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 4, 1793.

SIR: I have lost no time in preparing, as far as has been practicable, consistently with the course of facts, the several statements required by the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 23d of last month; and I have concluded to add to them such further statements as appeared to me necessary to convey fully the information which is understood to be the object of those resolutions. It was my first intention to submit these statements collectively, with such explanatory remarks as the occasion might demand; but finding on experiment, from the extent and variety of the matter involved in the resolutions, that more time will be requisite for a full development of it than I had anticipated, considerations of weight in my mind have determined me to present the different parts of the subject successively. Among other advantages incident to this course of proceeding, will be that of having it in my power to give a more accurate and mature view of the entire subject, without too great a dereliction of the current business of the Department. In executing the task I propose to myself, I shall rely on the indulgence of the House to a latitude of observation, corresponding with the peculiar circumstances of the case.

The resolutions to which I am to answer, were not moved without a pretty copious display of the reasons on which they were founded. These reasons are before the public, through the channel of the press. They are of a nature to excite attention, to beget alarm, to inspire doubts. Deductions of a very extraordinary complexion may, without forcing the sense, be drawn from them. I feel it incumbent upon me to meet the suggestions which have been thrown out with decision and explicitness. And while I hope I shall let fall nothing inconsistent with that cordial and unqualified respect which I feel for the House of Representatives, while I acquiesce in the sufficiency of the motives that induced on their part the giving a prompt and free course to the investigation proposed, I cannot but resolve to treat the subject with a freedom which is due to truth and to the consciousness of a pure zeal for the public interest.

I begin with the last of the four resolutions, because it is that which seeks information relating to the most delicate and important of the suggestions that have been hazarded.

Here, however, I have to regret the utter impossibility of a strict compliance with the terms of the resolution. The practicability of such a compliance would suppose nothing less than that, since the last day of December, 1792, all the accounts of all the Collectors of the Customs, and other officers of the revenue throughout the whole extent of the United States, could be digested, made up, and forwarded to the Treasury—could be examined there, settled, and carried into the public books under their proper heads. In a word, that all the accounts of the revenues, receipts, and expenditures of this extensive country, could have passed through a complete exhibition, examination, and adjustment within the short period of twenty-three days.

It was made (as I presume from the result) satisfactorily to appear to a Committee of the House of Representatives, who were charged during the last session with framing a direction to the Treasury for bringing forward an annual account of Receipts and Expenditures, that the course of public business would not admit of the rendering of such an account in less than nine months after the expiration of each year; in conformity to which idea, their report was formed and an order of the House established.

I need do nothing more, to evince the impracticability of an exact compliance with the resolution in question, than to observe, that it is even more comprehensive (though with less detail) than the order of the House to which I have alluded. To evince, nevertheless, my readiness to do all in my power towards fulfilling the views of the House, and throwing light upon the transactions of the Department, I shall now offer to their inspection sundry statements, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, which contain, as far as is at this time possible, the information desired, and with sufficient certainty and accuracy to afford satisfaction on the points of inquiry involved in the resolution.

The statement A shows in abstract the whole of the receipts into, and expenditures from, the Treasury, commencing with the first of January, and ending with the last of December, 1792, corresponding with the accounts of the Treasurer. These accounts have been regularly settled up to the end of September, and copies have been laid before the two Houses of Congress. The account for the quarter terminating with the year has not yet passed through the forms of settlement, but is under examination, and will, no doubt, be settled as it stands—the manner of conducting the business, and the usual care and accuracy of the officer concerned, leaving very little room to apprehend misstatement or error. A copy of this account is herewith submitted in the schedule marked C.

This statement takes up the balance of the general account of Receipts and Expenditures to the end of the year 1791, as reported to the House of Representatives within the first week of the present session, and continuing it down to the end of 1792, shows a balance then in the Treasury of $783,444 51.

* For this statement, see ante page 1191.

Loans.

The statement B is a more comprehensive document. It is a general account of Income and Expenditure. It shows not merely the actual receipts of money into the Treasury, but the whole amount of the national revenues from the commencement of the present Government to the conclusion of the year 1792, as well outstanding as collected—the proceeds of Domestic Loans—the whole amount of the sums which have been drawn into the United States on account of the Foreign Loans—and all other moneys, from whatever source, which have accrued within the period embraced by the statement.

These items form the debit side of the account, amounting to $17,879,825 33.

The credit side consists of two items. First, the whole amount of the actual expenditures to the end of the year 1791, as stated in the general account of Receipts and Expenditures before referred to. Second, the whole amount of the actual expenditures during the year 1792, as specified generally in the statement A, and particularly in the several quarterly accounts of the Treasurer, amounting to $12,765,128 83.

The balance of this account of Income and Expenditure is, consequently, $5,114,696 50; which corresponds with the excess of the public income (including the proceeds of Loans foreign and domestic) beyond the actual expenditure, or, more properly speaking, disbursement to the end of the year 1792. This of course is exclusive of those parts of the proceeds of Foreign Loans which have been left in Europe to be applied there; the amount, application, and balance of which are exhibited, as far as they are known at the Treasury, in the statement No. 1 of my late Report on Foreign Loans.

This balance, as noted in the statement B, is composed of the following particulars:

I. Cash in the Treasury, per statement A	$783,444 51
II. Cash in the Bank of the United States, and the offices of Discount and Deposit of New York and Baltimore, not yet passed to the account of the Treasurer, per statement A B	605,983 08
III. Proceeds of Amsterdam bills remaining in deposit in the Bank of North America, including the sum of $156,595 56 cents advanced by the Bank without interest, which is credited in the general account of Receipts and Expenditures, statement A	177,998 80
IV. Proceeds of Amsterdam bills sold but not yet received	614,593 02
V. Cash in hands of Collectors of Customs, per abstract D	151,851 25
VI. Bonds unpaid at the end of the year 1792, on account of the duties on imports, and falling due between that time and May, 1794, per abstract E	2,442,069 15

VII. Uncollected residue of duties on spirits distilled within the United States, per abstract F,

341,057 19
Total
$5,116,897 00

This aggregate somewhat exceeds the balance of the account; but, in a case where estimates must necessarily supply the deficiency of ascertained results, differences of this nature are of course. It is, at the same time, satisfactory to observe that the estimates which have been heretofore communicated are proved, by the official documents already received, to have been essentially correct. It will no doubt readily occur to the House that a very small part of the excess, which has been stated, is a real surplus of income. There remain to be satisfied numerous objects of expenditure charged upon the fund by the appropriations which have been made, that cannot fall ultimately to exhaust it, probably within four or five hundred thousand dollars; which will be embraced in the appropriations for the service of the year 1793. A further explanation on this point is reserved for future communication.

A due comprehension of the statements now presented, must obviate every idea of a balance unaccounted for, in whatever sense the allegation may have been intended to be made. If there was before any obscurity on the subject, it was certainly not the fault of this Department. Till the last resolutions, no call has been made upon it which rendered it proper to exhibit a general view of the public moneys and funds, or to show the amount and situation of such as were unapplied. Particular calls for particular objects were made, which as I conceive were complied with; but they were not comprehensive enough to embrace a disclosure of that nature. It could not, therefore, with propriety have been alleged that there was a balance unaccounted for. To infer it from documents, which contained only a part of the necessary information, was not justifiable, nor could it otherwise happen than that conclusions wholly erroneous would be the consequences of taking such imperfect data for guides. It may be of use, by way of elucidation, to point out some of the most palpable features of the error which has been entertained.

The following items are stated as the basis of the supposed deficiency:

Residue of the proceeds of the Foreign bills supposed to be unapplied, (after deducting the sums furnished for St. Domingo, and the amount of the Debt to Foreign officers) - $1,668,190

Surplus of Sinking Fund, meaning, I presume, that part of the surplus of the revenue to the end of the year 1790, which had not been applied in purchases - 400,000

Surplus of revenue of the year 1792, as reported - 277,385

Total - $2,345,575

Loans.

Deduct in Bank, meaning I presume the balance of the Treasurer's cash account - - - - - 790,642

Balance unaccounted for - $1,554,933

It appears in the first place to have been overlooked, that in statement No. 3, of my late Report concerning Foreign Loans, mention is made that, on the 3d of January, there remained to be received of the proceeds of the Foreign bills $632,132 02; consequently that sum could not be considered as in the Treasury, and ought to be deducted from the supposed deficiency.

Among the official papers which it is intimated were consulted, was an original account, rendered by the Bank of the United States, of the sales of Amsterdam bills, showing a sum of $605,883 08, as having been received by the Bank and two of its offices of Discount and Deposit, for the proceeds of those bills. Had the document been understood, it would have been known that this sum was in Bank, over and above the balance of the Treasurer's cash account; and this, also, would have served to account for a large part of the supposed deficiency, namely, $605,883 08. The course of this transaction will be hereafter explained.

But among the misconceptions which have obtained, what relates to the surplus of revenue of the year 1792 is not the least striking. The laws inform (and consequently no information on that point from this Department could have been necessary) that credits are allowed upon the duties on imports of four, six, nine, twelve months, and in some cases of two years. Reason dictates, that a surplus in such case must be considered as postponed in the collection or receipt till all the appropriations upon the fund have been first satisfied. The account of Receipts and Expenditures to the end of 1791, in possession of the House, shows that at that time no less a sum than $1,828,289 28 of the antecedent duties were outstanding in bonds. How, then, could it have happened that the surplus of 1792 was sought for in the Treasury at the very instant of the expiration of the year? I forbear to attempt to trace the source of a mistake so extraordinary.

Let me, however, add that of the surplus in question, $172,584 82, are not payable till April and May, 1794, as will be seen by the abstract E. Thus have I not only furnished a just and affirmative view of the real situation of the public account, but have likewise shown, I trust in a conspicuous manner, fallacies enough in the statement, from which the inference of an unaccounted for balance is drawn, to evince that it is one tissue of error. In this I might have gone still further, there being scarcely a step of the whole process which is not liable to the imputation of misapprehension. But I wish not unnecessarily to weary the patience of the House.

Another circumstance to which importance has been given, and which was noticed in connexion with the suggestion last discussed, is a disagreement between a memorandum in the Treasurer's Bank Book and the statement reported by me, of the amount of bills drawn at the Treasury upon the Foreign Fund. A disagreement no doubt exists, and to the extent of 5,760,138 florins or guilders.

But the following circumstances contain the solution of this disquieting appearance.

There will be found in the statement A two several credits, each for $2,000,000, as for moneys received into the Treasury, with corresponding debits of equal sums as for moneys paid out of the Treasury. But neither the one nor the other did in reality take place. The whole is a mere operation to accomplish the purposes of the eleventh section of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," without an inconvenient and unnecessary displacement of funds.

That section authorizes a subscription to the stock of the Bank, on account of the Government, not exceeding in amount $2,000,000, and provides for the payment of it out of the moneys which should be borrowed by virtue of either of the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790—the first making provision for the Public Debt, the last for reducing it; enjoining, at the same time, that a Loan should be made of the Bank to an equal amount, to replace the moneys which were to be applied to the payment of the subscription.

It is evident that nothing could have been more useless (at the same time that it would have been attended with obvious disadvantages to the Government) than actually to draw from Europe, out of the moneys borrowed there, the sum necessary for the payment of the subscription to the Bank, and again to remit out of the Loan which was to be obtained of the Bank a sufficient sum to replace such moneys, or such part of them as may have been destined for the Foreign object. Loss upon exchange in consequence of overstocking of the market with bills—loss in interest by the delays incident to the operation, and which would necessarily have suspended the useful employment of the funds for a considerable time—these are some of the disadvantages to the Government. To the Bank alone could any benefit have accrued, which would have been in proportion to the delay in restoring or applying the fund to its primitive destination. Such an operation, therefore, could only have been justified by an indisposition on the part of the Bank to facilitate the principal object, without the intervention of actual payment. But no such disposition existed. On this, as on every other occasion, a temper liberal towards the Government has characterized the conduct of the directors of that institution.

It was accordingly proposed by me, and agreed to by them, that the object to be accomplished should be carried into effect by a merely formal arrangement. In this, however, it was necessary to consult the injunctions of law, and the principles of the constitution of the Treasury Department.

These points, then, were to be effected—a payment of the subscription money, to vest the Government with the property of the stock; possession of the means of paying it, which were to be derived from the Foreign Fund, and of course were first to be in the Treasury before payment could be made; the replacing what should be taken from that fund by a Loan of the Bank.

The following plan for these purposes was devised and executed by previous concert:

The Treasurer drew bills upon our Commissioners in Amsterdam for the sums requisite to complete the payment on account of the subscription. These bills were purchased by the Bank, and warrants in favor of the Treasurer upon the Bank served to place the proceeds in the Treasury.

Warrants afterwards issued upon the Treasurer, in favor of the Bank, for the amount of the subscription money, which was received for on the part of the Bank as paid. Other warrants then issued in favor of the Treasurer upon the Bank, for equal sums, as upon account of a Loan to the Government; which warrants were satisfied by a re-delivery to the Treasurer of the bills that had been drawn upon the Commissioners. In the last place, warrants were drawn upon the Treasurer to replace the moneys, supposed by the arrangement to be drawn from the Foreign fund, which which has been given, it will be seen that in fact no moneys were either withdrawn from or returned to that fund. The bills were cancelled, annexed to the warrants, and are lodged in the Treasury as vouchers of the transaction.

These bills were for two separate sums, each 2,475,000 guilders, equal to $1,000,000; the payment having been divided into two parts, upon certain equitable considerations, relative to the dividend of the first half year.

This transaction explains 4,950,000 guilders, of the sum which forms the disagreement between the memorandum in the Treasurer's Bank Book and the statement reported by me.

The residue is thus explained. The sum of 1,237,500 guilders, directed to be drawn for on the 30th of November, was directed to be comprised in one or more bills, as the Bank should desire. It was at first placed in one bill; but this bill was afterward returned, with a request that it might be converted into smaller sums. The bill returned was cancelled, and in lieu of it there had been furnished, prior to the first of January of the present year, 934,500 guilders—the balance, 303,000, then remaining to be furnished. The sum of 934,500 guilders consequently appears twice in the memorandum.

These two sums of 4,950,000 and 934,500 guilders, exceed the difference in question by 124,362 guilders.

The Treasurer informs me that there are two bills not included in the memorandum; one for 123,750, and the other for 612 guilders, which make up the above mentioned excess. The former of these two bills was furnished to the Secretary of State for the purpose contemplated by the 3d section of the act of the last session, entitled "An act making certain appropriations therein specified."

Is it not truly matter of regret, that so formal an explanation on such a point should have been made requisite? Could no personal inquiry of either of the officers concerned have superseded the necessity of publicly calling the attention of the House of Representatives to an appearance, in truth, so little significant? Was it seriously supposable that there could be any real difficulty in explaining that appearance, when the very disclosure of it proceeded from a voluntary act of the Head of this Department?

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.
The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

					783,444 51

3. Of this sum, $156,595 56 are considered as in deposit, by way of counterbalance to an advance made by the Bank for the use of the Department of War, for the purposes of the act passed the 3d of March, 1791, for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers. It has remained without final adjustment, from a doubt whether the funds, upon which the appropriations which comprehend the surplus of duties to the end of 1791 are bottomed, are fully sufficient. A sum of about $50,000 must depend on the existence of certain surpluses upon antecedent appropriations, which it is believed will not require the full sums appropriated; but the purposes of those appropriations not being yet finally satisfied, the real state of the business is not yet completely ascertained. An example of this exists in the case of a sum of $40,000, appropriated for paying off certain specie claims on the Quartermaster's Department, incurred during the late war. It is known that further claims exist, but not to what extent. There are several other cases attended with similar uncertainty. A recent examination leaves some doubt whether warrants can yet safely issue to wind up the transaction.

5. Whether the sum here stated as outstanding be correct, must in a degree depend on the accuracy of the estimated product of the duties. It will be observed that the product, as carried into the statement, was originally fixed by estimation; and even now the materials in possession of the Treasury, respecting a branch of revenue, for known reasons not yet reduced to perfect order, are unavoidably imperfect, and liable to some error. The estimate may exceed or fall short of the reality, and proportionally affect the outstanding balance. But, however this may turn out, it cannot affect the merits of the statement. The excess or deficiency of one side of the account would correspond with a like excess or deficiency on the other. The auxiliary statement, however, marked F, serves to show that there can be no material error in the estimate.

6 and 7. These two items are also liable to some degree of uncertainty. The cash returns of the Collectors not being all received up to the end of the year, and some disbursements which were to be made to that time not having been completed, the amount which was then in their hands cannot be pronounced with precision. The difference, however, which may appear upon a settlement of their accounts, cannot be material. In like manner, as monthly abstracts of bonds up to the end of the year have not yet been received from some ports, and it has been found necessary to supply the deficiency by a comparative estimate, the result may vary somewhat from the fact. But enough is ascertained to pronounce that the difference must be inconsiderable; and, in reference both to the cash and bonds in the hands of the Collectors, whatever difference may hereafter appear, is liable to the same remark as to the merits of the statement, which has been made in regard to the duties on distilled spirits. The differences in both cases must resolve themselves into the circumstance of the estimated amounts of the duties proving greater or less than the real amounts.

Secretary of the Treasury.

LOANS.

[Communicated to the Senate February 6, 1793.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 5, 1793.

SIR: In pursuance of the first part of the order of the Senate of the 23d of January past, I have the honor to send herewith, sundry statements, marked A, AB, B, B a, D, E, F, and I beg the permission of the Senate to add the copy of a letter dated yesterday, which served to transmit duplicates of the same documents to the House of Representatives, and which contains some explanations of them, a repetition of which here will be thereby rendered unnecessary. The document C, referred to in that letter, was also sent to the House of Representatives, but being of considerable length, a duplicate is not yet ready; and I did not think it advisable to detain the other papers till it was ready.

The documents now transmitted will answer the whole of the inquiry contained in the first part of the order above referred to, except what regards a distribution of the expenditures under each head of appropriation, which is in preparation, and will be forwarded as soon as it can be ready.

The situation in which I am placed renders further delay absolutely necessary to the fulfilment of the second part of the order.

There is a point in my Letter of the 16th of January to the Senate, concerning which some explanation is requisite. I stated, as one motive to the joint negotiation of the Loans, under both acts, "an intimation from our bankers in Holland that a distinction might prove an embarrassment, being a novelty, the reason of which would not be obvious to the money-lenders." This was done from memory, without recurrence to documents, and in a degree of hurry occasioned by my anxiety for the speedy passing of the Appropriation bill, and upon a revision, proves to be not accurate. The mistake arose in the following manner: My original idea was, to maintain a separation between the two acts. This will appear from my Letter of the 28th of August, 1790, to our bankers, in which I express a desire that they would endeavor to place part of the first Loan upon one act, and another part upon the other act. But they did not carry this idea into execution, for the reason assigned in their answer, now before the Senate, which is, that the subdivision proposed would, under the circumstances of the case, tend to excite speculations and doubts among the money-lenders.

But, prior to the receipt of their answer, I had made further inquiry, and had reflected more on the subject. The result of my inquiry was, that the money-lenders, having been accustomed to lend on the general credit of the Government borrowing, with a sort of general pledge of its revenues and resources, the attempt to bottom a Loan upon any particular law, might, as a novelty, occasion some hesitation and embarrassment among them, especially as they are known to be a description of men much influenced by habit and precedent; and the conclusions, from more full reflection, were, that the distinguishing of the Loans with reference to each act, might not only embarrass the business, in the first stages of negotiation, but might interfere with an application of the proceeds of the Loans in the most convenient and beneficial manner, according to circumstances. On these considerations, I abandoned my original intention, and, in my first instruction to Mr. Short, was silent on the point.

These different positions of the subject in the mind, at different times, and what actually took place with regard to the first Loan, produced some confusion in the recollection of facts, and led me to assign as a cause what had been only a collateral circumstance, and to ascribe to the bankers intimations, or rather information, which I had received from other quarters.

I submit this explanation of the matter to the candor of the Senate, and have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

February 5, 1793.

SIR: By order of the President of the United States, I have the honor to transmit, herewith—

1. Copies of a power given by him to the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, dated the 28th of August, 1790, for the negotiation of the Loans authorized by the laws of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, and of certain instructions relative thereto, dated on the same day.

2. Copies of an authority founded upon the power of the President from me to William Short, Esq., dated the 1st of September, 1790, and of sundry letters from me to the said William Short, of dates from the 29th of May, 1790, to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusively, relating to the negotiation and application of the above-mentioned Loans.

3. Originals of sundry letters from William Short to me, under dates from the 2d of December, 1790, to the 2d of November, 1792, inclusively, relating to the same subject.

4. Copy of an authority from me to Messrs. Willhem and John Willinks, Nicholas and J. Van Slaphorst, and Hubbard, bankers of the United States at Amsterdam, dated the 28th of August, 1790, relating to the first of the Loans made under the above-mentioned acts, and copies of sundry letters to the said bankers, of dates from the 28th of August, 1790, to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusively.

5. Originals of sundry letters from the said bankers to me, of dates from the 25th of January, 1790, to the 5th of November, 1792.

6. Copies of sundry letters, of dates from the 18th of June to the 24th of September, 1792, inclusively, between G. Morris and W. Short, Esq., having relation to the above subjects.

The general power from the President to the

Loans.

Secretary of the Treasury, of the 28th of August, 1790, and the communications from William Short, Esq., who has been the only Commissioner, would, it is presumed, have fulfilled the terms of the resolution of the Senate of the 23d of last month, and are transmitted, pursuant to the request contained in that resolution.

But the President has been pleased to direct the transmission of the other documents also, in the supposition that they will serve to throw light upon the general subject of that resolution.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, yours, &c.,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

[NOTE.—Of the papers referred to in this Report, none are now to be found, except those published with the Secretary's second Report, of the 13th February, 1793.]

LOANS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

SIR: The next most important article of inquiry involved in the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the twenty-third of January last, and in the observations which have been made respecting the conduct of this Department, relates to the Loans negotiated under the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790.

The papers which have been transmitted to the House by order of the President, disclose the following particulars—

I. That the immediate superintendence of the business of the Loans was confided to the Department of the Treasury, being naturally connected with it. This trust, besides the original instructions for regulating the execution of it, which have been communicated, was of course subject to such directions from time to time as the President should think fit to give, or as occasion should require. A considerable latitude of discretion, nevertheless, from the very nature of the case, attended it; so as justly to leave on the head of this Department a complete responsibility in all instances, where special exceptions do not appear.

II. That the first Loan which was obtained, was undertaken and completed by the agency of Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, who, both under the former and present Government, have been and are the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam.

III. That with the single exception of the first Loan, William Short, Esq., then Chargé des Affaires at the Court of France, now resident Minister at the Hague, was constituted the sole agent of this Department, for carrying into effect the powers confided to it; with this qualification only, that if any negotiation with a Prince or State, to whom any part of the Debt to be discharged by the Loans, was due, should be requisite, the same was to be carried on through the person who in capacity of Minister, Chargé des Affaires, or otherwise, then was, or thereafter might be charged with transacting the affairs of the United States, with such Prince or State.

IV. That all payments, which have been made out of the proceeds of the Loans, have been made by the immediate and special order of Mr. Short, except those, upon the bills of the Treasurer for the moneys drawn to this country, and those to the money-lenders in Holland; which were made in course by our bankers, at the periods they respectively became due. This consequently embraces all the payments to France; the very last of which, though agreed for by Mr. Morris, in consequence of his having been employed for a special purpose by Mr. Short, was not, and could not, be completed, but by the same immediate and special direction of Mr. Short.

It moreover appears, from the same papers, and more fully from the correspondence at large, now before the Senate, that except in the particular instance which has been just stated, with regard to Mr. Morris, there has been no other agency in the whole business, than that of Mr. Short, and of the bankers at Amsterdam and Antwerp, whom he necessarily employed as instruments in the negotiations with the money-lenders, and in the receipt and disbursement of the moneys borrowed. These, as already mentioned, were, at Amsterdam, the two houses of Wilhem and Jan Willink, and of Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst and Hubbard; at Antwerp, a Mr. G. De Wolf was the banker.

It may not be without its uses to add, that the moneys proceeding from the Loans, have constantly remained in the hands of the respective bankers, till they have been paid over to the creditors; namely, the French treasury, or their bankers, the money-lenders or their representatives, the holders of the bills drawn from this country by the Treasurer. Neither Mr. Short nor Mr. Morris has ever had possession of a single guilder. The latter, indeed, has never even had power over one, excepting merely a sum of 105,000 guilders, by letters of mine, dated the 13th September last, placed at his disposal for paying at Paris, according to stipulation, the interest on the Debt due to foreign officers. The fact is, and it is so demonstrated by the correspondence already referred to, that I never wrote a line to Mr. Morris on the subject of the Loans or their proceeds, but in reference to the case just mentioned of the interest payable to foreign officers, in respect to which, local situation governed.

One more circumstance only is necessary to be noticed in this place, with a view to the elucidation intended. It is this: that the last payment, though originating prior to the change in the political position of France of the 10th of August last, not having been consummated until the 6th of September following, fell of course under the disposition of those then in possession of the power of the nation.

It could not but have been unexpected to me, that exception should be taken to the Report lately made by me on the subject of Foreign Loans, for the omission of details which I did not at that time, and do not yet, conceive, to have been called for, by the terms of the resolutions upon which it was founded. The request addressed to the President, by those resolutions, was, that he would cause to be laid before the House a particular account of the sums borrowed under his authority by the United States, the terms on which each Loan was obtained, the applications which had been made of the moneys, agreeably to appropriations, the balances, if any, which remained unapplied, specifying also, at what times interest commenced on the several sums obtained, and at what times it was stopped by the several payments made. It was not natural to imagine that these expressions were designed to comprehend a specification of the precise authorities, under which the Loans were negotiated, of the names of the persons by whom they were negotiated, of the particular place or places, where the balance unexpended of the sums that had been drawn for to the United States, were deposited. Still less natural was it for me to anticipate surmises, which could give to such particulars the shadow of importance. But as animadversions have attended the omission of those details, I ought to regard it as an admonition to me, to be more full and precise in my present communication; a motive which co-operates with my desire, to throw all possible light upon the subject.

The first general circumstance, which requires to be noticed and explained, after the particulars that have been communicated, is this: that all the Loans which have been hitherto obtained, have been made under the authority of both acts, without particular reference to either.

The idea originally entertained, was to conduct them on a different plan, founding each Loan upon one or the other of the acts, as will be seen by my letter of the 28th of August, 1790, to our bankers at Amsterdam; at the same time, that it will appear, from the same letter, that the separation did not appear to me a matter of consequence, and that I anticipated the possibility of a difficulty in adhering to it in the particular case. That difficulty, proved in the opinion of the bankers, to be of sufficient moment to render the arrangement contemplated, under the circumstances of the case, unadvisable, as they inform me in their answer to the abovementioned letter.

But prior to the receipt of that answer, further inquiry and reflection had determined me to abandon my original idea, as likely to produce embarrassment and inconvenience, both in the negotiation of the Loans, and in the application of their proceeds. It was accordingly concluded to let the Loans proceed indiscriminately, upon both acts.

These Loans were to have reference to two purposes; first, the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt; second, the purchase of the Domestic Debt at its market price.

There were weighty reasons for carrying on both these operations concurrently. The arrears to France had been a considerable time accumulating. It was in every sense proper that a reimbursement of them should begin without delay, and desirable for obvious reasons, that it should go on without any very considerable chasms or intermissions. This manner of proceeding could not but have the fairest chance of being the most satisfactory and convenient to France; unless, indeed, the business were to have proceeded upon the principle of an entire postponement of the domestic object, to that of the reimbursement.

But very cogent reasons rendered this course not the most eligible. The early commencement of purchases of the Debt was a matter of real and great importance.

It was important in two relations; as it regarded the advantages to the Government, from redeeming a portion of the Debt at low prices; and still more, as it regarded the savings to the country from raising the price of stock on foreign purchasers; the beneficial influence upon the credit of the nation abroad and at home, to be expected from a quick appreciation of the public obligations; the benefit to the public creditors in general, and to the most meritorious classes of them in particular, which would result from the same cause; all which objects were suggested from the Treasury, as motives to the provision respecting purchases, and are evidently contemplated in the preamble of the act which makes that provision.

Exclusive of the other advantages which have been cited, and which are of a nature truly precious and important, that of preventing foreigners from acquiring the property of our citizens at a great under-value, is too obvious not to be estimated, as it ought to be, at first sight. It cannot require argument to show how great an evil it was, that foreigners should be able to acquire with nine or ten, that for which the country would ultimately have to pay them twenty, with full interest in the interval; nor how much it merited the attention of the Government to prevent or lessen so serious an evil.

But the influence which the purchases by the Government may have had upon this event may not be equally obvious. It is, however, not difficult to be traced. Price naturally keeps pace with competition and demand; whatever increases the latter, necessarily tends to an augmentation of the former. Merely then as another purchaser, by adding to the competition and demand, the purchases of the Government were calculated to influence a rise of price. But they had an effect more than proportioned to their extent. Imagination has much to do in all such questions, and in scarcely anything so much as in what relates to public funds. Experience proves, that it is here exerted with uncommon effort. The appearance of the Government as a purchaser has not failed to excite the expectation of a greater demand than was real, because the extent of the resources to be employed might be very great, and was unknown; which, by stimulating the zeal of those who wanted to buy, lest the price should rise suddenly and considerably upon them, and by encouraging those who wanted to sell, under the hope of a better price, to hold back the commodity, has in both ways gene-ally contributed to give a spring to the market. Prices once raised, when founded on intrinsic value, tend to maintain themselves; because those who have given them, are for the most part interested in keeping them up. And every new impulse, which they receive, serves to carry them rapidly to their just level.

Those who have been most attentive to the operation of the public purchases, will have the least doubt that they had a material agency in accelerating the appreciation of the public stock.

An inquiry naturally arises here. Were the moneys which were drawn from Europe on account of the Foreign Loans, the instrument of the purchases, to which these beneficial effects are ascribed?

I answer, that these purchases are to be attributed to the instrumentality of that fund; that had it not been for this resource they could not have been made at the early periods when most of them were made. The course of the transaction will be fully, and with more propriety, explained in another place.

An attention to both objects—to the reimbursements to France, and to the purchases of the Debt, rendered expedient a subdivision, even of the first Loan. Considerations of the moment seconded those of a general nature, to induce an immediate payment to that country. The Loan had been undertaken without previous authority from hence, with a view to such payment. This was known, and a correspondent expectation excited. The immediate situation of the French finances rendered a payment at the particular juncture more than ordinarily interesting. In such a state of things, there could be no hesitation about applying a large part of the Loan to that object. Another part of it was, of necessity, applied to the payment of the sums that were falling due on the Dutch Loans. And it is presumed that the reasons which have been assigned, will appear to have been sufficiently powerful to have dictated the drawing of a part of it to the United States.

Accordingly, a million and a half of the three millions borrowed, were appropriated to France, something more than eight hundred thousand guilders were drawn for here, and the remainder of the Loan was left to be disbursed in Holland.

It shall not be concealed, though I am aware that the acknowledgment may be a subject of criticism, that the conduct which was pursued, both with regard to this and to the succeeding Loan, was in some degree influenced by a collateral consideration. The Government had but just adopted a plan for the restoration of public credit. The periodical payment of interest was to commence on the 1st of April, 1791. A considerable part of the revenue, out of which the moneys were to arise, was only to begin to accrue on the first of January preceding. This revenue was liable to credits of four, six, and twelve months.

How far its eventual product would answer expectation—how far the punctuality of payments could be relied upon—were points unascertained, and which required to their ascertainment much more experience than had been obtained. In such a situation, it was not only natural but necessary for an Administrator of the Finances to doubt; and doubting, it was his duty to call to the aid of the Public Credit every auxiliary which it was in his power to command. He was bound to reflect, that a failure in any stipulated payment would be fatal to the dawning credit of the country—to the reputation of the Government—just beginning to rise. That a wound inflicted upon either, at so early a stage, under all the circumstances of opposition to the Constitution, which had existed in the community, would have been deeply felt, and might either not have admitted of a cure at all, or not till after a length of time, and a series of mischiefs; that it could not but be an important service rendered to the country to ward off so great a misfortune by the temporary use of any extraordinary resource, which might be at hand, till time was given for more effectual provision.

If, in the course of such reflections, a doubt had occurred about the strict regularity of what was contemplated as a possible resort, a mind sufficiently alive to the public interest, and sufficiently firm in the pursuit of it, would have dismissed that doubt as an obstacle, suggested by a pusillanimous caution, to the exercise of those higher motives, which ought ever to govern a man invested with a great public trust. It would have occurred that there was reasonable ground to rely that the necessity of the case, and the magnitude of the occasion, would insure a justification; and that, if the contrary should happen, there remained still the consolation of having sacrificed personal interest and tranquillity, no matter to what extent, to an important public interest; and of having avoided the humiliation which would have been justly due to an opposite and to a feeble conduct.

The disposition which was resolved upon, with regard to the first Loan, involved, necessarily, a decision of the point, that the Loans might be placed on the joint foundation of both acts. That Loan having been undertaken, as already mentioned, without previous authority, and consequently without a particular eye to either act, it was probable that it would be found too late to make an apportionment of one part of the sum borrowed to one act, of another part to the other act. In that case, the distributive application of the fund to the different objects was to be relinquished, or the possibility was to be admitted, of the Loan being left to stand upon the authority of both acts. The same disposition of the first Loan will also illustrate the convenience and expediency of the plan which was finally adopted; that is, of placing the Loans on the basis of both acts.

The idea of a concurrent execution of both the objects to which the Loans were destined, could not conveniently have been pursued upon the plan of a separation of the Loans; which, to be effectual, would include the strict application of the proceeds of each to the purposes of the particular act upon which it was founded.

Amsterdam was naturally looked to, as the great scene of the intended Loans. There, as every where else, there is but a certain quantity of money floating in the market, from time to time, beyond the necessary demands of trade and industry, seeking for employment in Loans. This quantity, of course, varies at different periods, from a variety of causes. Of the quantity at any time afloat, but a certain proportion can be commanded by any one-borrowing Power, owing to the competition of other borrowers, who have each their connexions, through their bankers, with different sets of undertakers. Nor is it always that considerable Loans can be had at any rate. There are certain seasons only when they are practicable.

To have brought two Loans upon the market at one time, as an opportunity of borrowing offered, which must have been the case, in order to make concurrent provision for both the objects in question, if the principle of a separation of the Loans had been adopted, would have been to exhibit to the money-lenders a very unusual appearance. With men known to be much influenced by precedent and habit, such an appearance could not have failed to prove a source of speculation and conjecture; and might have led to a confused idea that the wants of the United States were extensive; a supposition by no means calculated to promote their credit. It would, moreover, have been a departure from that simplicity of procedure which, where numbers are concerned, is always of moment to a right conception of the business to be accomplished, and ought not to be abandoned, but for reasons of real utility and weight.

To have instituted the Loans successively, founding each upon one or the other of the acts, would have had a tendency to occasion longer intervals between the payments to France than was desirable. The intervention of a Loan for the purpose of purchases would have created, of course, a very considerable chasm. It may be objected, that such chasms did happen on the plan which was pursued. This is true in two instances, but the most material of the two proceeded from casualties foreign to the plan itself, which are detailed in the correspondence more than once alluded to.

It is possible, too, that a separation of the Loans might have rendered it less easy to take advantage of a state of the market, favorable to their extension at a particular juncture. The Loan to be brought on the market might relate to the purchase of the Debt. The moment might be favorable to a more considerable Loan than was within the limits prescribed for that object, and the opportunity might slip before a second could be instituted. In this business moments are often of importance, and are to be embraced with promptitude and dexterity.

Thus it appears that, in different ways, the negotiation of the Loans might have been embarrassed by their separation.

But the most obvious, if not the most serious of the inconveniences which would have attended it, respects the application of the sums borrowed. This could not then have been moulded, as the interest or policy of the Government might dictate. A Loan for the purchase of the Debt might have been made under prospects promising a ready and beneficial investment of it; but, before the investment was made, a change of the market might render it ineligible—involving the alternative, either of a disadvantageous investment, or of leaving, perhaps, a large sum of money a long time unemployed. Such a state of things might have produced to the banks an advantage, and to the Government a loss of magnitude, sufficient to give color to a surmise, that the public interest had been sacrificed to the profit of those institutions. The contrary course has essentially avoided that evil; which, in this and in other instances, would have been incident, in a far greater degree, to the modes of proceeding, contrasted with those that have been pursued, than has in reality attended them.

Or political considerations might have rendered it advisable to transfer the application of the fund from one object to the other.

Of this, the case of St. Domingo presents an example. It might have happened on the plan of separate Loans, that there was no fund in hand but for the purchase of the Debt. Then, on the principle of that plan, there would have been no fund in the disposition of the Executive, applicable to the other object, which would have embarrassed the performance of a duty towards a friendly Power, and in a way which included the positive advantage to the country of paying directly a part of its Foreign Debt, in its own productions.

Such were the embarrassments avoided, and such the conveniences secured, by the plan of making the Loans indiscriminately, upon the authority of both acts.

In the opposite plan, I can discern no counterbalancing advantage nor convenience.

Consequently, if both are equally legal, there can be no doubt which of them ought to have been preferred.

If there be any want of legality in the plan which has been pursued, I was not at the time, and am not yet, sensible of it.

I know of no rule which renders it illegal in an agent, having from the same principal two authorities to borrow money, whether for one or different purposes, to unite the Loans he may make upon the foundation of both authorities, provided the terms of them be consistent with both or either of his commissions. If the purposes are different, it will be incumbent upon him to take care that the application of the moneys borrowed makes the proper separation, and, doing this, he will have fulfilled his trust. To test this position, it seems only necessary to ask, whether the principal, in such case, would not be fully bound to the lenders?

In reflecting originally upon the regularity of the proceeding meditated, there was but one source of hesitation—the difference in the funds upon which the Loans were to rest. But the following reasoning satisfied the scruple: The pledging of particular funds is for the security of the lenders. If they are willing to waive the special security by lending on the general credit of the Government, or to dispense with the preference of one fund to another, where two are pledged, by lending indiscriminately on the credit of both, the one or the other circumstance must be alike indifferent to the Government. The authority will have been well executed, to the extent necessary for public purposes, and if any thing remains unexecuted, it will be in enlargement, not in abridgment of the public rights. It is, however, presumed that the practical construction in the present case will be, that the two funds pledged will constitute an aggregate for the joint security of the moneys borrowed upon both acts.

The second general circumstance respecting the Foreign Loans negotiated under the acts of the 4th and 13th of August, which requires attention, relates to the terms on which they have been obtained. These, it appears, have been represented as neither honorable nor advantageous.

The following facts, witnessed by the correspondence before the Senate, more than once referred to, and well known to all who have had opportunities of information, demonstrate that the terms of those Loans have been both honorable and advantageous:

1. There is not one of them, which originated under the acts, that was not effected upon conditions equally favorable with those attending the Loans of the cotemporary borrowing Powers of the most tried resources and best-established credit, and more favorable than were obtained by some Powers of great respectability.

2. The United States took a lead in the market in regard to the subsequent reductions of interest, having had either earlier or more complete success than any other borrowing Power.

3. From a rate of five per cent. interest and four-and-a-half per cent. charges, which marked the level of the market when they began their Loans, they, in the course of a single year, brought down the terms to four per cent. interest and five per cent. charges; that is, from an interest on the net sum received (including an indemnification for charges) of 5.5012, something more than five-and-a-half per cent., to an interest on the like sum of 4.4951, something less than four-and-a-half per cent.

When this state of things is applied to a Government only in the third year of its existence, and to a country which had so recently emerged from a total derangement of its finances, it would seem impossible to deny that the issue is not only honorable but flattering; unless, indeed, it can be denied that a sound and vigorous state of credit is honorable to a nation.

I forbear a comparison between the Loans of the present and of the former Government of this country, because an immense disparity of circumstances would render it an improper one, further than to take notice of a very great error which has been upon some occasions advanced. It has been alleged, to disparage the management under the present, that the Loans of the former Government, in a situation comparatively very disadvantageous, have been effected upon equal terms; and in proof of this an appeal has been made to the Loan of 2,000,000 of guilders, at four per cent., which is that of the 9th March, 1784.

Nothing can manifest more clearly than this the very precipitate and superficial views with which suggestions on important public subjects are sometimes made. The last four per cent. Loan obtained under the existing laws, including charges, is a real four-and-a-half per cent. Loan, or, more exactly, a 4.4951 per cent. Loan. The four per cent. Loan of March, 1784, is a real 6.4468 per cent. Loan. The difference, which exceeds two per cent., arises principally from extra premiums and gratifications which were allowed upon this Loan, and which are unknown to the other.

Much praise is no doubt due to the exertions which effected the Loans under the former Government. A superiority of merit shall readily be conceded to them, from the circumstances under which they were made, and their signal utility in the Revolution. But it is not necessary to their eulogium to affirm that they were made upon equal terms with those of the Loans lately obtained, or to deny the goodness of the terms of the latter. Truth will not justify the one or the other.

The facts which have been stated prove that the terms of the Loans are advantageous as well as honorable. They are comparatively advantageous, because they are as moderate as other Powers in the best credit have allowed; and they are absolutely advantageous, because the highest real not nominal rate of interest which has been given does not exceed 5.5012, a fraction more than five-and-a-half per cent., while the lowest real rate is 4.4951, a fraction less than four-and-a-half per cent.

If the question whether advantageous or not be tested by the purposes for which the Loans have been made, the conclusion is equally in their favor. The payments on account of the Foreign Debt were an indispensable obligation. Unless it can be shown that they might have been derived from another and more advantageous source, it will follow that it was the interest of the Government to avail itself of the resource which has been employed, because it was its duty to discharge its obligations.

It is sometimes urged that Foreign Loans, for whatever purpose, are pernicious, because they serve to drain the country of its specie for the payment of interest, and for the final reimbursement of principal; that it would be preferable, for that reason, to procure Loans at home, even at a higher rate of interest.

To this, several answers may be given, some of a special, others of a general nature.

In reference to the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt, it may be observed, that, as a Debt had already been incurred abroad, upon which interest was payable, the contracting of new Loans there for the reimbursement of that Debt would leave us, as to the demand for the exportation of our specie, just where we originally stood. Moreover, if the money could have been borrowed at home for that reimbursement, the remittance of it would have been ruinous to the country. The mere necessity of remitting could not alone have increased the foreign demand for our commodities, so as to deduce from an extra exportation of them the requisite means of payment; and if our specie was to perform the office, the country would speedily have been exhausted to a degree inconsistent with the support of its commerce and industry. The quantity of coin in the United States has never been considerable enough for such an operation.

But this very state of things would have rendered the procuring of the money from domestic resources impracticable. These, it may be safely affirmed, are too limited for extensive Loans of any considerable degree of permanency.

In the last place, the expedient of Domestic Loans would not prevent the evil which is desired to be prevented. Foreigners would either in the first instance bring their moneys to subscribe them to the Loans, or they would afterwards purchase the stock arising from them, and, in either case, they would equally draw away the money of the country on account of their interest and principal. The only consequence of giving a disproportionate rate of interest for Domestic Loans would be that our specie would be carried away so much the faster.

Experience having shown that nations sometimes pay more regard to their external than to their internal credit—this consideration co-operates with reasons of convenience to induce moneyed men abroad to be content with a lower rate of interest, stipulated to be paid in their own country, than if the place of payment be in another country; making even a greater difference than is an equivalent for the expense and risk of obtaining remittances. The clear inference from these observations is, that, with regard to the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt, no other expedient than that of Foreign Loans was practicable or eligible.

The utility of that part of the Loans which has been explained in certain views. So far as their agency has been hitherto concerned in that operation, it is a sufficient demonstration of the advantage of the measure to state that the sum invested in purchases up to the period of the last Report to Congress has redeemed what is equal to an annuity of 6.15 per cent., including also the advantage of sinking a capital more than fifty per cent. greater than the sum expended.

A valuable profit will arise from the investment of the sums on hand, either in a payment to the Bank or in the purchase of stock. The liberation of an annuity of six per cent. can be secured, while, upon a great part of the fund which is to effect it, no more than four-and-a-half per cent. is payable, and less than five-and-a-half upon the other part. The mean of these rates being five per cent., an annual saving of one per cent. may be effected, which, upon $2,000,000, interest at five per cent., is equal to a capital or gross sum of $400,000—an item certainly of no inconsiderable consequence.

Against the advantages which are claimed in favor of the Loan, it is natural to place the loss of interest incident to the delays which have attended their application to the purposes for which they were obtained. This leads to an examination of the cases of delay, their causes, the circumstances, if any, which counterbalance them.

There are three instances of material delay—

one respecting the first Loan, another the second Loan, and a third a part of the two last Loans.

The first Loan, it will be seen, was not applied till a considerable time after its commencement. It has been already intimated that it was undertaken without previous authority from this country. The motives to the measure are detailed in a letter from our bankers of the 25th of January, 1790, a copy of which accompanies the communications herewith made by order of the President. A regard to those motives led to an acceptance of the Loan. Nor could it have been deemed an unfortunate circumstance that such an auxiliary to the operations of the Treasury had been previously prepared.

The laws authorizing the Loans passed the 4th and 12th of August. As early as the 28th of that month, the acceptance above mentioned was communicated, and the application of 1,500,000 florins, in a payment to France, directed. So far, no time was lost, more than could not have been avoided.

But the bills for the sum to be brought here were not drawn till some months after. This proceeded from an unwillingness to risk the public funds, by drawing before there was a certainty of that the great delay which had attended the passing of the law for borrowing might have led the bankers to come to some arrangement with the money-lenders for surrendering the moneys paid in and terminating the Loan. Independent of this source of apprehension, they had expressed themselves, in their letter communicating the step they had taken, to this effect: "To spare the United States all possible advance of interest, while the money shall remain unappropriated, we shall issue the receipts at the option of the buyers to take them so late as they please, on the expectation that the three millions would be placed in a few months." This, though it announced an expectation that the moneys would be paid in in a few months, did not render the event certain. And as the bankers appeared, from that precaution, to have adverted to the idea of saving the United States an advance of interest, it was supposable that they might have found means still further to procrastinate the payments, or a considerable part of them, till they had received a confirmation of the Loan. This policy would have been the more natural, as they risked the loss of interest themselves, if the transaction should not have been finally ratified.

Under such circumstances, I thought it most prudent to defer the drafts until advice was received of the actual progress of the Loans. There was no room to hesitate between the loss of a small sum in interest and the danger of committing the public credit by a premature operation.

The second case of delay relates to the second Loan. It was occasioned by a determination to suspend the orders for its application till information was received of its having been contracted for. One motive to this determination has been already intimated, namely, the yet untried and immature state of our fiscal arrangements. The general reasoning on this head was strengthened by an occurrence altogether unlooked for, which disclosed itself on the 23d of August, 1790, eleven days after the rising of Congress—an occurrence which they had not contemplated in their pecuniary dispositions. I allude to the commencement of an Indian war, which was announced in a Letter from Governor St. Clair, dated on the above-mentioned day, the progressive extent and consequences of which could, of course, not be foreseen. Under such circumstances, I judged it for the public interest and safety to hold the resource which the prospect of a Loan presented under the power of the Treasury till advice should be received of the actual institution of the Loan, with intention then to dispose of it as should appear advisable, under a better matured view of our pecuniary situation and prospects.

Hence the delay which attended the application of the second Loan; the first in fact that originated subsequent to the laws for borrowing. But after advice had been received of its having been set on foot, no time was lost in converting it with due despatch to its proper uses. There was only, not an anticipation of its application. As early as May 24th, 1791, I wrote a letter to Mr. Short (a copy of which is in possession of the House) empowering him to apply the proceeds of all future Loans, as they should accrue, in payments to France; except as to such sums as therein were, or afterwards should be previously and specially reserved. This arrangement was calculated to obviate the inconvenience of leaving the proceeds of the Loans, for any considerable time, unemployed. At the period of making it, and not sooner, the public prospects appeared to me sufficiently unfolded, to render a general and permanent disposition free from hazard. This instruction preceded in due season all the Loans subsequent to that of March, 1791.

Whatever delay, therefore, may have attended succeeding investments for paying the French Debt, is not attributable to this Department. And I think it will not appear, that any has been incurred, in respect to the sums which were destined for the public service here. In judging of this point it will be proper to observe, that a latitude of six months, for making their payments, has been reserved to the money-lenders, though with liberty for the Treasury to regulate its bills according to the possible delay, lest they should not meet adequate funds. The general policy adopted was to let them fall upon the rear of each Loan; this giving a freer course for early payments to France, and best conciliating a certainty of funds for answering the bills, with as little double interest as possible.

It will appear, that notwithstanding the arrangement which was made, a considerable time intervened between the two last payments to France, while there were funds in hand waiting for employment. It may be expected, that the causes of this procrastination, though as I have said not imputable to this Department, should be unfolded to the House. Particular circumstances, however, induce me to confine myself to stating generally, that the delay proceeded, in the first place, from expectation given to Mr. Short, and kept up from time to time by the French Minister of Marine, that a plan would be adopted, to which a decree of the National Assembly was requisite, for converting a large sum into supplies for St. Domingo, which Mr. Short concluded justly must come out of the Foreign Fund, and consequently suspended its application in Europe. In the second place, from a desire to settle, previously to further payments, a definitive rule, by which the moneys paid, should be liquidated and credited to the United States.

Both the one and the other appears to have been procrastinated from period to period, by the disorderly state of French affairs, and to have finally issued contrary to expectation. It would be an unnecessary commitment of my opinion to declare, how far the delay appears to me to have been justified by the causes. But, being led by the occasion to take notice of it, I think it improper to send it abroad, liable, perhaps, to misconstruction, without observing that the inducements appear to me, to have been weighty; that the delays naturally grew out of the circumstances, and that I am entirely persuaded of the goodness of the motives which governed. The correspondence before the Senate contains the particulars of the transaction. Having pointed out the instances of material delay which happened, and the causes of them, it remains to state what circumstances there are to counterbalance the loss on that account.

These circumstances are of two kinds.
1. Gain by exchange in the sale of the bills drawn by the Treasury and upon the higher rate of interest on the credits which were given for those bills, than was payable on the fund upon which they were drawn.

2. Gain by exchange on the payments to France. According to my calculation, founded on the best information extant, the real par of the metals between the United States and Amsterdam, makes a current guilder equal to 35 89-100 ninetieths of a dollar. The lowest rate which has been obtained for the bills has been 36 4-11 ninetieths, with an allowance of sixty days credit without interest. Making a deduction for the interest the bills were still sold above the true par. In some instances they have been sold as high as forty cents and seven mills per guilder, with interest for the whole term of the credit given.

The rate of interest for the credits allowed upon the bills was six per cent., the mean interest paid upon the fund five per cent, producing consequently a gain of one per cent.

With regard to the payments to France, if the current rate of exchange between Paris and Amsterdam at the moment of each remittance or payment were to govern, a large profit would result to the United States. But certain equitable considerations will produce deductions, which will greatly lessen this advantage; yet, making a liberal allowance for them, there is ground to calculate that a saving may be made in this particular, more than sufficient to indemnify for the loss of interest. Hence, any positive advantage which will have

I proceed, in the next place, to state the views which prevailed respecting the sums that have been from time to time drawn for; the purposes they have hitherto answered, and the further advantages to be expected from the measure.

The direct object of all the sums drawn for prior to July, 1792, was the purchase of the Debt. A collateral consideration, which operated in the first stages of drawing, has also been mentioned. It has likewise been stated, that the early purchases of the Debt are to be ascribed to the instrumentality of the fund derived from the Loans. This idea shall now be explained.

Two mistakes appear to have influenced the impressions which have been entertained in relation, directly or indirectly, to this subject.

1st. It seems to have been all along forgotten, that a considerable part of the duties is always outstanding, on account of the credits which are given; whence the assertion, that the Sinking Fund has continually overflowed from domestic resources.

2d. It seems to have been taken for granted that the proceeds of the Loans have remained apart, distinct from the mass of the money in the Treasury; while in truth the course of the business has been to turn them over to the Treasurer by warrants as they have been received, so as to form a part of the aggregate, from time to time appearing in his hand and in his accounts. The Banks have been the agents employed for selling the bills, sometimes warrants on account have issued upon them, from the sums accruing from the sales, at other times the warrants have been deferred till the whole proceeds of any parcel have been received, and the accounts of the Bank settled at the Treasury, as the state of the Treasury has happened to render the one or the other most convenient.

The Banks of North America and New York were the agents for the sale of all the bills, which were sold prior to April, 1792, amounting to $1,006,526 36. Of this sum $361,391 34 were passed over to the Treasurer in 1791; $327,136 22 in March, 1792, and $140,000 in June following; the residue having remained as heretofore stated, in deposit with the Bank of North America, upon a special consideration. This is exclusive of certain bills furnished for the use of the Department of State, amounting to $78,766 67.

The remainder of the bills which have been sold, beginning in April, 1792, were sold by the Bank of the United States and its branches at New York and Baltimore. The accounts of the sales had just been made out for settlement, when the present inquiry began, but warrants had not yet issued for placing the proceeds in the Treasury. It will be remarked that, from the terms of credit allowed, they only began to be receivable in October last; the 26th day of which month the first return made by the Bank shows a sum of $127,225 53 received; and that the collection had not been completed when the accounts of the sales were rendered.

There are different views of the subject, which will enable the House to perceive that the possession of the fund in question was necessary to enable the Treasury to furnish the means of making all the purchases which were made prior to July, 1792.

It is true, that there was a surplus of revenue to the end of the year 1790, equal to $1,374,656 40, which was appropriated to purchases of the Debt; and from the credits then given upon the duties, this surplus would naturally come into the Treasury in the course of the year 1791.

But the Legislature, foreseeing that the revenue of 1791, from the same cause, could not actually be in the Treasury, within that year, to face the appropriation upon it, (which it is to be observed were nearly commensurate with the fund,) inserted a clause in the law, appropriating the surplus of 1790, to the purchase of the Debt, which authorized a reservation of so much of that surplus as might be necessary to make the payments of interest during 1791, in case of a deficiency in the receipts into the Treasury, on account of the current revenue of the year.

It will appear to the House, upon a recurrence to the Treasurer's quarterly account, ending the 30th of September, 1791, that the balance of cash then on hand was $662,233 99.

At that time there had been paid into the Treasury, upon warrants, from the proceeds of the bills drawn upon the Foreign Fund $361,391 34. Consequently, the balance of cash, had it not been for that auxiliary, would have been only $300,842 65, considering the whole balance in the Treasury as representing an equal sum of the proceeds of the bills.

Even in a time of complete peace, in a country where a small extent of moneyed capital forbids a reliance upon large pecuniary aids to be suddenly obtained, a prudent administrator of the finances could not feel entirely at ease, with a less sum at all times in the certain command of the Treasury, than $500,000, for meeting current demands and extra exigencies, which, in the affairs of a nation, are every moment to be expected. But with a war actually on hand, and a possibility of its extension to a more serious length, he would be inexcusable, in leaving himself with a less sum at command; unless from an impracticability of doing otherwise. It would be always his duty to combine two considerations—the chance of extra calls for money, and a possibility of some failure in the receipts which were expected. Derangements of various kinds may happen in the commercial circle, capable of interrupting for a time the punctual course of payments to the Treasury. It is necessary to a certain extent to be prepared for such casualties.

But during the year 1791, there was a circumstance which operated as an additional reason for keeping a respectable sum always on hand. The Loans of the Domestic Debt were going on till the last of September of that year, while at the same time, the interest was in a course of payment. It was, therefore, always uncertain what sum would be payable at the end of a quarter; this depending on the eagerness or backwardness of the public creditors in bringing forward their subscriptions, or their claims as non-subscribers. The omissions, at the end of a preceding quarter, might be expected to fall on a subsequent one, and it was necessary to be prepared for that possibility; of course to keep in hand a larger sum for contingent demands. This necessity extended to the termination of the period for receiving subscriptions, because the Treasury was to be prepared on the supposition that the whole of the Domestic Debt would then be in a state to receive interest either, as subscribed or unsubscribed. But this did not in fact happen. A part of the sums which were presented were crowded into the last days of the quarter, and were too late for a dividend. A considerable sum remained ultimately in a form which, according to the terms of the provision, did not entitle it to interest, either as subscribed or as unsubscribed Debt.

Hence the cash in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1791, was by a considerable sum greater than was to have been counted upon or than might have happened.

The conclusion which results from the foregoing observations is this, that the purchases which preceded the 1st of October, 1791, and which amounted to $699,964 23 in specie, could not have been hazarded, but for the aid of the sums which had actually accrued from the proceeds of the bills and the expectation of those which were to accrue from the yet uncollected proceeds of others.

Had it not been for this aid, the Treasury would have been left more bare than was consistent with the security of public credit and the certain execution of the public service.

There is, however, a later period in the state of the Treasury, which will more completely illustrate the idea intended to be established. This is the 2d of July, 1792.

On that day, the balance of cash in the Treasury, comprehending the deposits in all the Banks, and including a sum of $200,000, retrieved on Loan of the Bank of the United States, together with a sum of $220,900 in bills drawn upon Domestic Funds, the proceeds of which had not been received, was $623,133 61.

Prior to this period a further sum of $545,902 89 arising from the sales of Foreign bills had been placed in the Treasury, by warrants, making with the former sums placed there from the same source, $907,294 23.

Had it not been for this auxiliary, and that of the Loan from the Bank, the Treasury would then have been in arrear $484,160 62. It, therefore, necessarily follows, that for the purchases to that period, which amounted in specie to $942,672 54, at least $484,160 62 must have come from the Foreign Fund.

But when it is considered, for the reasons which have been stated, and which will hereafter be fortified by others, tending, as I conceive, to give them conclusive force, that the sum in the Treasury at the period in question was barely what ought to have been there for safety, and for a due supply of current demands; it will follow that the whole or nearly the whole of the purchases which were made previous to July, 1792, were made by the means or instrumentality of the Foreign Fund. A similar view, extended to the subsequent quarter, will exhibit this point in a still clearer light. The balance then in the Treasury, including a further Loan from the Bank of $100,000, was only $420,914 51.

What, then, it may be asked, became of the surplus of revenue to the end of 1790? What was the office performed by that fund during the period in question?

The answer is, that it served exactly the purpose which was anticipated by the Legislature. It came in aid of the current receipts for satisfying the current expenditures of 1791, with particular reference to the interest of the Debt. This will easily be comprehended when it is recollected that the appropriations made during 1791, upon the revenues of that year, and some small surpluses of antecedent appropriations, amounted to three million six hundred and thirty-seven thousand and fifty-eight dollars and thirty-four cents; that the revenues themselves amounted to no more than $3,553,195 18; and that at the end of 1791, there were outstanding in bonds for the duties on imports, besides the chief part of the proceeds of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, then also uncollected, $1,528,269 28.

On this point likewise, of the surplus of revenue to the end of 1790, it is presumable a misapprehension has been entertained. It seems to have been supposed, that that surplus, as well as the proceeds of the Foreign Fund, have been kept separate and distinct from the common mass of the moneys appearing from time to time to be in the Treasury. It has been already observed, that this was not the case with regard to the Foreign Fund. It is now proper to add, that it has not been the case, either, with regard to the surplus in question. That surplus, as received by the Collectors of the Customs, has regularly passed into the Treasury, and appears in the quarterly accounts of the Treasurer for the periods to which they relate.

It is the course of the Treasury, for all moneys from whatever source to be brought into it, to constitute an aggregate, subject to the dispositions prescribed by law. The moneys to be employed in the Sinking Fund have consequently only been separated, as they have been called for, for actual investment. The only exception to this, relates to that part of the Sinking Fund which is created by the interest of the Debt purchased. This has been included in the quarterly dividends, and covered by the warrants, in favor of the cashiers of the Banks for paying those dividends, after which, they have passed into a distinct account, in the books of the Bank opened with Samuel Meredith, as agent to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.

To the foregoing representation, it may seem an objection that the purchases to the end of 1791, appear to have been carried to the account of the surplus at the end of 1790.

The ultimate form which it has been judged convenient to give to the transaction in the accounts of the Treasury, cannot change what was truly the course of facts. The proceeds of the above mentioned surplus and of the Foreign Loans formed together the fund for purchases. In the accounts of the Treasury, the thing was susceptible of various modifications at pleasure. The two parts of the fund might have been united in one account, or divided into distinct accounts. Being separated, moneys issued for purchases might have been legally carried to either of them.

It was judged most advisable, in the forms of the Treasury, to place the purchases to the end of 1791, to the account of the Domestic Fund, because it was calculated to give greater latitude and energy to the Sinking Fund. Had not this course been pursued, the business would have taken the following shape: the Foreign Fund to the extent of the purchases, would have been exhausted—the whole, or the greater part of the surplus of 1790, would have continued wrapt up in the expenditure of 1791, not liable to be liberated, till the receipts into the Treasury should yield a correspondent surplus beyond the actual disbursements—which could not have been the case, while the war with the Indians continues to call for extraordinary expenditures.

From the form into which the thing has been thrown, the Foreign Fund has been set free to be applied to further purchases; and a necessity produced of anticipating the outstanding duties, by temporary Loans for the current service.

I trust there can be no doubt, that the course pursued was regular, and within the discretion of the Department. I hope, also, that it will appear to the House to have been the most eligible. The expediency of giving the earliest and greatest possible extent and activity to whatever concerns the Sinking Fund, will, it is presumed, unite all opinions.

What has been said hitherto respecting the employment of the Foreign Fund is applicable only to that part of it which was drawn for prior to April, 1792; the residue standing in a different situation, and requiring a separate examination.

From the statement which has been given, it may be perceived that the fund in question has neither been idle nor useless. A confirmation of this will be found in the following details.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, up to the 17th of August, 1791, was $361,391 34. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases, prior to that day, was $356,000, chiefly by anticipation of those receipts.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, from August 17, 1791, to March 1, 1792, was $408,722 69. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases between those periods, was $349,984 23; chiefly in the month of September, and by anticipation of those receipts.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, subsequent to the 1st of March, and prior to July, 1792, was $235,412 33. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases between those periods, was $242,688 31.

It was stated in my first letter, that $177,988 80, of the proceeds of the Foreign bills were left in deposit with the Bank of North America; and in a note upon statement B, accompanying that letter, the occasion of it was shown to be an advance without interest, made by that Bank, for the use of the Department of War; which could not yet be covered, in consequence of a doubt still remaining whether the fund appropriated for satisfying that object was adequate to it; the sufficiency of that fund depending in part on certain unexpended residues of antecedent appropriations, which it was expected would not be finally necessary for satisfying the purposes of those appropriations.

It is to be remarked, that the delay of the employment of this part of the proceeds of the Foreign Fund, has been compensated by a saving of interest on the sum advanced by the Bank, which otherwise must have been procured upon a Loan, with an allowance of interest, probably, at the time of the advance, at a rate of six per cent.; so that even in this particular, the fund, though temporarily suspended from its destination, has not been idle or unproductive. I reserve for another place some additional observations and statements, which will be calculated to show that opportunities of investing the moneys at any time on hand, applicable to purchases of the Debt, were not suffered to pass unimproved; and that as much in this respect was done, as the state of the Treasury and the state of the market would permit.

It has been said, that a distinct examination would be proper with regard to the bills which have been drawn upon the Foreign Fund, subsequent to March, 1792. I proceed now to this examination.

The expediency of what has been in this respect done, seems to have been called in question, under a suggestion that an application of the fund to purchases had ceased to be advantageous.

The drawing of these bills has been, at different periods, influenced by various considerations. A leading motive was always the purchase of the Debt; and a correct view of the subject will, I doubt not, satisfy the House, that the measure was recommended by an adequate prospect of advantage.

It is to be observed that all these drafts were predicated upon the two four per cent. Loans; being, as already stated, real four-and-a-half per cent. Loans.

There was good ground to presume that opportunities would be found of investing the moneys drawn for in purchases which would yield at least five per cent., with a possibility of doing still better. The difference of half per cent. was alone an object of importance; but it would be coupled with the further benefit of reducing a principal sum materially exceeding the sum invested. When the three per cents. are purchased at twelve shillings in the pound, there is not only a redemption of an annuity of five per cent., but a sinking of a capital of twenty shillings for twelve. And though this might not be material if the market rate of interest should never fall below five, because in that case the three per cents. might always be purchased at the same rate; yet if it should at any time happen that interest fell below five, it would be a gain to the Government to have purchased at five, in exact proportion to the difference between five and the then market rate. Add to this, that the three per cents have generally a value in the market more than proportioned to the income they produce, which arises from the capacity of the capital to appreciate even to par.

These observations are, also, for the most part, applicable to the deferred, with this circumstance in addition, that when interest begins to be payable on that species of stock, the money invested and which in the mean time would have produced five, would then begin to produce to the Government six per cent, with the advantage of having anticipated the redemption of a species of stock of right only gradually redeemable. Combining these considerations, it appears to be clearly and even eminently for the interest of the Government to purchase within the limits suggested, with a fund which does not cost more than four-and-a-half per cent.

That this was the view of the subject which governed, is deducible, not only from the circumstances of the fact, but from my letter of the 2d of April, 1792, to Mr. Short, announcing my intention to draw, in which I assign, as the ground of that intention, "that I considered it for the interest of the United States to prosecute purchases of the Public Debt, with moneys borrowed on the terms of the last Loan," meaning the Loan of the 1st of January, 1792, at four per cent.

If the event be taken as a criterion, the anticipation will be more than justified; the present juncture offering an opportunity for purchases peculiarly advantageous.

But, without insisting on a state of things occasioned by extraordinary circumstances, it was morally certain that the common course of events would render the operation a beneficial one. And it would not argue peculiar foresight if a calculation was even made on the effect which the situation and probable progress of affairs in Europe might produce upon our market. A pretty general war there, by extending the demand for money, would naturally divert from our stocks a portion of what might otherwise be employed upon them, and affect injuriously their prices. It is also a familiar fact, that during the winter, in this country, there is always a scarcity of money in the towns; a circumstance calculated to damp the prices of stock.

A consideration which collaterally influenced the drawing of the latter bills, was the situation of the French Colony of St. Domingo.

This not only produced an early application for a considerable advance, which was promised, but it was to be foreseen that still further aids would be indispensable.

Indeed, sundry letters from Mr. Short—the first dated at Paris, the 28th of December, 1791—announced the daily probability of an arrangement, requiring an advance here of $800,000, for the use of that Colony. A sum of four millions of livres has in fact been successively stipulated for that object, the greatest part of which has been actually furnished.

It is known that these supplies could proceed from no other source than the Foreign Fund.

The payment to the foreign officers of near two hundred thousand dollars, by which an interest of six per cent. would be released, was another object for which provision was to be made out of the same fund.

These several purposes conspired, with the object of purchasing the Debt, to induce the latitude of drawing which took place.

But there was still a further inducement, which came in aid of the others. The time for reimbursing the first instalment of the two millions of dollars due to the Bank, was approaching, when, by positive stipulation, the Government would have to pay two hundred thousand dollars for which there was no Domestic Fund that could be spared from the current exigencies. I thought it incumbent upon this Department to have an eye to placing within the reach of the Legislature the means of fulfilling this engagement; the object of which bore a strict analogy to that for which the two millions, authorized by the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, were to be borrowed.

I did not even scruple to take into the calculation, that if, from the extent of the drafts upon the Foreign Fund, there should happen to be found on hand a larger sum than was necessary for, or could be advantageously employed towards, the several purposes which were the immediate and direct objects of the operation, the surplus would facilitate to the Government a measure manifestly and unequivocally beneficial—an additional payment to the Bank, on account of a Debt, upon which an annual interest of six per cent. was payable; a measure by which a certain saving of one per cent. to the extent of the payment that might be made would be accomplished.

The possibility of this application of the fund, afforded a perfect assurance that the public interest could in no event fail to be promoted.

I felt myself more at liberty to do it, because it did not interfere with a complete fulfilment of the public engagements in regard to the Foreign Debt. It could be done consistently with a full reimbursement of all arrears and instalments which had accrued on account of that Debt.

The detail which has been given comprehends a full exposition of the views and motives that have regulated the conduct of this Department in relation to those parts of the proceeds of the Foreign Loans which have been transferred to the United States, except as to the last sum of one million two hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred florins, directed to be drawn for on the 30th of November last; in regard to which, circumstances of a special nature co-operated, as is explained in a note upon the copy of my letter of the 26th of that month, to Mr. Short, forming a part of the communication herewith made by order of the President of the United States.

The House will perceive that the variety of matter comprised in this letter, has not been collected and digested into its present form without much labor, and unavoidable expense of time. I trust they will be sensible that no delay has been unnecessarily incurred. It is certain that I have made every exertion in my power, at the hazard of my health, to comply with the requisitions of the House as early as possible; and it has even been done with more expedition than was desirable to secure the perfect accuracy of the communication.

Yet I have still to regret that some part of the subject must remain to be presented in a subsequent letter. To lessen, however, the inconvenience of this further delay, I shall transmit, with the present letter, the statements required by the first and second of the resolutions of the 23d of January, which will be found in the schedules herewith marked No. I to V; those required by the last of the resolutions having been already forwarded.

There remain, however, some particulars to complete the information contemplated by those resolutions, that must be reserved for another communication. This I may venture to assure the House will not be deferred beyond the present, or at least the first day of the ensuing week.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER,

of the House of Representatives.

The previous sickness, and afterwards the death of Mr. Eveleigh, the late Comptroller, which happened on the 15th of April, 1791, occasioned an accommodation between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Bank of North America, with respect to a number of warrants which were not countersigned, the Bank agreeing to pay them and retain them in its possession till the appointment of a Comptroller, when they could be regularly countersigned and charged to my account. This caused an agreement with the Comptroller, that the two first quarters of the year 1791 might be included in one account, in order that the different offices in the Treasury Department should correspond in their balances.

ations in the said several acts contained: And whereas, Messrs. Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, have, by letter, bearing date the 25th day of January, 1790, communicated to me, that they have entered into a certain provisional agreement or arrangement, for a Loan of three millions of florins, for the use of the United States of America, bearing an interest of five per centum per annum, and reimbursable by yearly instalments, of six hundred thousand florins, commencing in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, and ending in the year one thousand eight hundred and five: And whereas, it appears to me for the interest of the said United States to accept the said Loan:

Now, therefore, be it known: That I, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the time being, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested, by the said President of the United States, and in his name, and on behalf of the United States of America, and to their use, do, by these presents, accept, agree to, ratify, and confirm, the Loan aforesaid, provisionally undertaken by the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard. And I do hereby authorize and empower the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, or, in case of the death of any of them, the survivors, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, either by way of confirmation of the said provisional agreement, or otherwise, as need may be, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, three millions of florins, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained and above recited; and for that purpose, in the name of the said President, on behalf of the United States of America, to execute such contracts, obligations, and instruments, as shall be necessary, and comfortable to use, in the like cases, and the faith of the United States to pledge for the performance of the terms thereof; and if the same shall be deemed requisite, to stipulate for the ratification thereof by the President of the United States; hereby giving and granting to the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, and the survivors of them, all my power and authority, in the premises, and ratifying, allowing, and confirming, whatsoever they shall lawfully do therein.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the Treasury to be affixed to these presents, and have hereunto subscribed my hand, the twenty-eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

No. 4.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

Whereas, by an act passed the fourth day of August, in this present year, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," it is, among other things, enacted, that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums, not exceeding in the whole twelve millions of dollars, and that so much of that sum as may be necessary to the discharge of the said arrears and instalments, and (if it can be effected upon terms advantageous to the United States) to the paying off the whole of the said Foreign Debt, be appropriated solely to those purposes; and that the President be, moreover, further authorized to cause to be made such other contracts respecting the said Debt, as shall be found for the interest of the said States: Provided, nevertheless, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into, which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed, within fifteen years after the same shall have been lent or advanced:

And whereas, by another act, passed the 12th day of August, in the present year, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," it is, also, among other things, enacted, that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent:

And whereas, by virtue of the said several acts, the President of the United States of America hath been pleased, by a certain commission or warrant, under his hand, to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, by himself, or any other person or persons, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, within the said States, or elsewhere, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained:

Now, therefore, know ye: That I, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the time being, by virtue of the said commission, power, or warrant, of the President of the United States of America, have authorized and empowered, and, by these presents, do authorize and empower William Short, Chargé des Affaires of the United States at the Court of France, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, in any part of Europe, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States; subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained; and for so doing, this shall be his sufficient warrant.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the Treasury to be affixed to these presents, and have hereunto subscribed my hand, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

* The amount of livres here stated exceeds somewhat that which was stated in No. 1, of my last Report. It will be observed, that it was then mentioned, that the details of this transaction were wanting. They have since been received, and correspond with the present statement. The difference arises from the real rates of exchange at the times of the respective payments having been different from what was assumed by analogy as a rule of computation.

REMARKS.

(a) These Loans were negotiated under the late Government.
(b) The interest payable upon each of these Loans, at the expiration of the first year, was not due upon the entire capital borrowed, but in the proportion to the time in which the Loans were completed.

The sum of 1,833,189 florins, 2 stivers and 8 deniers, here stated, is the same as reported to the House by the Secretary on the 8d instant, in the statement No. 1.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

PUBLIC FUNDS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 14, 1793.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, in further pursuance of the order of the Senate, of the 23d of January past, three several statements, marked A, B, C.

A, being a general account of revenue and appropriations: exhibiting, on one side, all the income of the United States, except from the proceeds of Loans foreign and domestic, to the end of the year 1792; on the other, the respective amounts of all the appropriations which have been made by law, to the same period.

B, being a general account of appropriations and expenditures to the same end of the year 1792. This statement takes up the excess of the appropriations beyond the expenditure, to the end of the year 1791, as contained in the account of Receipts and Expenditures, reported to the House of Representatives during the present session; and, including all the subsequent appropriations and expenditures to the end of 1792, shows the balance unsatisfied of each head of appropriation.

C, being an explanatory statement, for the purpose of showing a conformity between the aggregate of the balances of appropriations unsatisfied, and the balance of the public income beyond the public expenditure, to the end of the year 1792, as represented in the statement B, heretofore reported.

It will be observed, that the most considerable item among the balances of appropriations, is for interest on the Public Debt—amounting to one million three hundred and ninety-five thousand eight hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty-five cents. This happens in three ways. 1st. The interest on the foreign part of the Debt has been paid in Europe, out of the proceeds of the Loans; the sum paid will consequently require to be replaced out of the domestic funds, and will operate as if an equal sum had been transferred here by drafts. 2d. The payment of interest to certain States, upon the difference between their quotas of the assumed Debt, and the sums subscribed upon the first Loan, has been suspended, in consequence of the opening of the second Loan, to avoid a double payment of interest, first to the States, and next to the subscribers, which might otherwise happen. 3d. There is a part of the Public Debt which has continued in a form that has not entitled the holders, under the existing laws, to receive interest, either as subscribers or non-subscribers.

There are certain arrears of interest, on the part of the Debt entitled to interest, which did not come into the accounts of the year 1792.

This balance of interest, however, will be a real future expenditure, as, indeed, will be the case with regard to most of the other balances of appropriations. There will be surpluses, but these surpluses cannot exceed, if they equal, the sum mentioned in my letter of the 4th instant, to the House of Representatives.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, Your obedient servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Remainder, being the unsatisfied appropriations charged upon the revenue

2,664,188 04

(a.) The difference between the actual dividends declared on the Public Debt to the end of the year 1791, as contained in the printed statement, and the entire interest for that year, as estimated, including the Foreign Debt.

(b.) The interest on the Debt for the year 1792, as estimated.

(c.) The sum requested by the National Assembly of France, by their decree of June 26, 1792, for the Colony of St. Domingo, four million livres.

(e.) The Debt payable to foreign officers, contemplated in the fifth section of the act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States.

(f.) In this balance is included two years' interest on the Foreign Debt, which has been paid out of the Foreign Loans, the accounts of which remain unsettled; also, the interest on that part of the Domestic Debt which has not been funded or registered at the Treasury, so as to be entitled to a dividend; and, also, the interest due to States on the unsubscribed balances of the assumed Debt, the payment of which is at present suspended.

(g.) Warrants for $445,263 83 had been drawn on the 31st of December, 1792, towards the Debt due to France, as stated in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 31st of January, 1793, $10,000 of which, however, had not been paid by the Treasurer at that time, and, consequently, not charged in his accounts.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

To the following sums, which rested as charges upon the excess of income stated per contra on the 31st December, 1792, viz:	By the excess of income beyond the actual disbursements of the Treasury, to the end of the year 1792, including all sums remaining uncollected at that time, as also $2,305,769 13, the proceeds of bills of exchange drawn on the foreign funds, as stated in the account marked B, rendered to the House of Representatives on the 4th of February, 1793.
Balances of unsatisfied appropriations, as specified in the schedule herewith, marked B	$2,684,188 04
Balance reserved to complete the sum requested for St. Domingo	290,736 17
Balance reserved to complete the payment of debts due to foreign officers	172,962 11
Debt due to the Bank of North America, for a Loan, without interest	156,595 56
Debt due to the Bank of the United States, for a Loan for the War Department	400,000 00
Balance of foreign fund not specially applied, and subject to disposition	3,704,481 88
Surplus of revenue above the appropriations to end of 1792, agreeably to statement marked A, herewith	1,388,452 23
	5,114,696 50
	5,114,696 50

The balance of the foreign fund, as herein stated, is thus deduced, viz:

The total amount of bills drawn was	-	-	-	$2,305,769 13
Deduct—
Paid for the Colony of St. Domingo, as per statement marked B	-	-	-	$435,263 83
Paid to foreign officers, as per ditto	-	-	-	18,354 79
Reserved to complete the payment for St. Domingo	-	-	-	290,736 17
Reserved to complete the payment to foreign officers	-	-	-	172,962 11

LOANS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 19, 1793.

Sir: The last Letter which I had the honor to address to the House of Representatives contained a pretty full exposition of the conduct and views of this Department in regard to the Foreign Loans. There remain, however, some incidental topics which it may not be expedient to pass over in silence.

In order to carry the attention of the House immediately to a just application of the remarks which will be submitted, it is necessary to premise, that it is known to have been suggested that the proceeds of the Foreign bills drawn for to this country had no object of public utility, answered none, and were calculated merely to indulge a spirit of favoritism towards the Bank of the United States.

It has already been shown, clearly, I trust, that, but for the instrumentality of the parts of the Loan drawn for prior to April, 1792, amounting nearly to one-half of the whole sum, the purchases of the Debt which were made to that time could not have been made; and that these purchases, besides being the object designated by law for the application of the fund, were productive of positive and important advantages.

How far the operation could have been influenced by motives of favor to the Bank of the United States, the following facts will still more completely decide.

That Bank did not begin its operations till the 12th of December, 1791.

The Banks of North America and New York were the agents of the Treasury for the sale of the bills in question. They sold them, collected, and, with the exception which will be presently stated, disbursed the proceeds.

The receipts on account of those bills began in March, 1791, and concluded in March, 1792.

On the 31st of December, 1791, as the Treasurer's account before the House will show, the public cash was deposited as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	- $133,000 00
In the Bank of North America	- 471,972 28
In the Bank of New York	- 224,677 35
In the Bank of Massachusetts	- 65,578 22
In the Bank of Maryland	- 50,665 29
In the Bank of Providence	- 7,969 61

- $953,862 75

There was then also some moneys in the Banks of North America and New York in a course of receipt which had not been passed over to the Treasurer; but all the public moneys, of whatever kind, in the Bank of the United States, are included in the above sum of $133,000, which had arisen from the duties on imports and tonnage.

It appears, then, that, on the 31st of December, 1791, no transfer for the benefit of the Bank of the United States had been made; and that the deposits of the Government there (exclusive of the proceeds of the bills remaining in the two Banks of North America and New York) amounted to little more than one-fourth of the deposits in the Bank of North America, and little more than one-half of those in the Bank of New York.

As late as the 1st of February, the State Banks continued to share with the Bank of the United States a large proportion of the public deposits. The state of the Treasury then was as follows, viz:

In the Bank of the United States	- $456,278 80
In the Bank of North America	- 151,516 32
In the Bank of New York	- 128,708 21
In the Bank of Massachusetts	- 71,215 55
In the Bank of Maryland	- 49,583 25
In the Bank of Providence	- 7,969 61

- $865,271 84

A concentration of the public deposits in the Bank of the United States was a measure which grew out of the relation between that establishment and the Government; yet, instead of hastening it through favor, it was resolved to let it have a gradual course, so as to consult, in a due degree, the convenience of the other banks, and to effect it rather by letting the public disbursements fall upon the moneys in those banks than by direct transfer.

But a state of things took place in the month of February, between the Banks of the United States and North America, which rendered a more expeditious transfer than was meditated, for the mutual convenience of the two institutions.

The effect of this was, that the state of the Treasury, on the 1st of March, stood as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	- $692,959 06
In the Bank of Massachusetts	- 31,769 05
In the Bank of New York	- 32,352 52
In the Bank of North America	- 31,515 74
In the Bank of Providence	- 8,404 94
In the Bank of Maryland	- 34,752 85

Making, together

- $831,754 16

But at this time there was in the Bank of New York, from the proceeds of the Foreign bills, $121,984 71, not transferred to the account of the Treasurer.

This accumulation, however, in the Bank of the United States was of very short duration.

On the 1st of April ensuing, the state of the public cash was as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	- $359,643 64
In the Bank of New York	- 254,930 41
In the Bank of North America	- 31,515 74
In the Bank of Massachusetts	- 37,712 58
In the Bank of Providence	- 7,156 65
In the Bank of Maryland	- 60,418 32

Making, together

- $751,377 34

A similar state of things lasted to the 1st of June, comparatively more disadvantageous to the Bank of the United States. The receipts of public revenue continued to go into the Bank of New

Loans.

York till the 1st of April, 1792, when a branch of the Bank of the United States began to operate in that city, which is the reason of the sum in the Bank of New York bearing so near a proportion to that of the Bank of the United States, and so far exceeding the Bank of North America. By this time, also, the balance of the proceeds of Foreign bills had been passed to the account of the Treasurer, yet still remaining in deposit in the Bank of New York.

These views of the state of the public cash are conformable to the Treasurer's statement of half-monthly balances, accompanying my Letter of the 13th instant.

The same statement will show that a proportion of the public deposits has continued, since the 1st of April, 1792, in the State Banks—in those of North America and New York down to the end of the period which that statement embraces. From these details, the following inferences are deducible:

That, as far as any advantages may have accrued from the deposits, on account of the Foreign bills drawn prior to April, 1792, they accrued substantially to the Banks of North America and New York, not to the Bank of the United States, or to its branches. That, in transferring the pecuniary concerns of the Government from the pre-existing banks to that of the United States and its dependencies, a cautious regard has been paid to the convenience of the former institutions, and the reverse of a policy unduly solicitous for the accommodation of the Bank of the United States has prevailed. Indeed, so much has this been the case, that it might be proved, if it were proper to enter into the proof, that a criticism has been brought upon the conduct of the Department, as consulting less the accommodation of the last-mentioned institution than was due to its relation to the Government and to the services expected from it.

But further examination will demonstrate another point, which is, that none of the establishments in question have received any accommodations which were not in perfect coincidence with the public interest, and in the due and proper course of events.

This examination will be directed towards two objects—one, the state of the Treasury at the commencement of each quarter, during the years 1791 and 1792; the other, the state of the market in regard to the prices of stock during the same years.

These periods are selected because they afford the truest criterion of the state of the Treasury, from time to time, being those at which the principal public payments are made, and for which it is necessary to be prepared by intermediate accumulations.

The state of the Treasury at the periods in question was as follows:

In the year 1791—
January 1	- $569,886 55
March 1	- 373,434 53
June 1	- 533,638 24
October 1	- 662,233 99

In the year 1792—
January 1 - 953,862 75
April 1 - 751,377 34
July 1 - 623,133 61
October 1 - 490,914 51
In the year 1793—
January 1 - 783,212 37
This appears from the statements Nos. 4 and 5, forwarded with my last Letter.
The state of the stock market during the several quarters of the same years was as follows:

FIRST QUARTER OF 1791.
Six per cents, from 16s. 9d. to 17s. 6d.
Three per cents, from 8s. 6d. to 9s. 4d.
Deferred, from 8s. 6d. to 9s. 4d.

SECOND QUARTER OF 1791.
Six per cents, from 17s. 0d. to 17s. 9d.
Three per cents, from 9s. 0d. to 10s. 0d.
Deferred, from 8s. 11d. to 9s. 4d.

THIRD QUARTER OF 1791.
Six per cents, from 17s. 10d. to 21s. 3d.
Three per cents, from 9s. 9d. to 12s. 5d.
Deferred, from 9s. 9d. to 12s. 10d.
As early as the 6th of August, the six per cents had a temporary rise to 21s., but, by the 18th, they had fallen to 20s., on the 20th, they had risen to 20s. 6d., and were sometimes above that rate, but never lower during the rest of the quarter.

As early as the 23d of July, the three per cents had reached 12s., and were sometimes higher, but never lower during the rest of the quarter.

On the 23d of July the deferred also reached 12s., and afterwards rose to 12s. 6d.

FOURTH QUARTER OF 1791.
Six per cents, from 20s. 4d. to 22s. 4d.
Three per cents, from 12s. 2d. to 13s. 8d.
Deferred, from 11s. 8d. to 13s. 6d.

The prices were lowest in the early, and highest in the latter part of the quarter.

During the whole of the month of December, the deferred was at 12s. 8d. and upwards, the greatest part of the time at 13s.

FIRST QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents, from 21s. 0d. to 25s. 0d.
Three per cents, from 12s. 6d. to 15s. 0d.
Deferred, from 12s. 0d. to 15s. 0d.

The low prices were, in the last ten days of March.

SECOND QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents, from 20s. 0d. to 22s. 6d.
Three per cents, from 12s. 0d. to 13s. 9d.
Deferred, from 11s. 6d. to 13s. 4d.

THIRD QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents, from 21s. 0d. to 22s. 3d.
Three per cents, from 12s. 4d. to 13s. 6d.
Deferred, from 12s. 3d. to 13s. 7d.

FOURTH QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents, from 20s. 2d. to 21s. 9d.
Three per cents, from 12s. 3d. to 13s. 6d.
Deferred, from 11s. 10d. to 13s. 6d.

Loans.

In October, the deferred was at the highest. The lowest prices were in the month of December.

This view of the subject is derived from a statement of prices, pursuant to actual purchases and sales, furnished by a dealer of this city, respectable for his intelligence and probity, combined with the accounts from time to time published in the Gazette of the United States. The papers marked (A x) and (B y) are transmitted for the more particular information of the House on this head.

The market prices of stock no doubt varied at other places; at some may have been higher, at others lower. At Philadelphia, too, it is believed that small sums were obtainable at particular periods, from necessitous individuals, below the prices in the statement.

But there is good ground of reliance that it is substantially a just representation of the state of the stock market during the periods to which it refers.

The state of the Treasury from the first of January to the first of October, 1791, may be said to have been at its proper level, exhibiting none, or an inconsiderable excess beyond the sum which has been mentioned as necessary to be there, and concerning which a further explanation has been promised, and will be given in the course of this Letter. The public purchases in August and September, 1791, amounted to $348,744 99.

In the last quarter of the year 1791, beginning with the month of November, and the first quarter of the year 1792, there appears to have been an excess of some magnitude in the Treasury, being from about $250,000 to about $450,000. Taking the first quarter of 1792 as the truest criterion, (which it certainly was, because, at the expiration of that quarter, the payment of interest on the assumed debt began, and was to be provided for,) the real excess ought to be considered as $250,000, with the addition of about $80,000 then in the Bank of North America, from the proceeds of Amsterdam bills, beyond the advances of the Bank for the public service, which had not been passed into the Treasurer's account. It is proper to remark that the course of importations occasions large receipts in the latter part of each year, which circumstance contributed to the accumulation in question.

From the last of November to about the 21st of March, an investment of the excess on hand in purchases was impracticable.

To enable the House to understand what is meant by saying that purchases were impracticable during that period, it is necessary to add, that the prices of stock exceeded the limits which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had prescribed to themselves. Indeed, a large proportion of the time those prices were manifestly artificial, and such as predicted a great fall not far distant. The delay incurred was accordingly well compensated by the prices at which investments were afterwards made.

From the 21st of March to the 25th of April, purchases were effected to the extent of $242,688 31 in specie; within $80,000 or $90,000 of what could have been spared, consistently with the rule which has been mentioned, as proper to regulate the arrangements of the Treasury.

But two circumstances operated against a further investment—a sudden rise of prices, and a state of temporary disorder in the two principal mercantile scenes of the country, (occasioned by the excessive speculations that had preceded,) which admonished the Treasury to be cautious in its disbursements.

It results from the foregoing view of the subject, that, as far as any extraordinary sum may appear to have remained unemployed in the banks a longer term than was desirable, it proceeded essentially from a state of things which did not permit its employment, and is in no degree attributable to that spirit of favoritism towards those establishments, or any of them, which has been imagined, as the solution of appearances not rightly understood and much overrated.

The only question, then, of which the matter is susceptible is this: Was not the state of things that did take place to have been foreseen, so as to have influenced the drawing for a proportionably less sum?

This question may safely be answered in the negative.

The bills, the proceeds of which contributed to constitute the excess, which remained unemployed during the two quarters, were drawn in May, 1791. In that month, the highest prices of stock were 17s. 2d. for six per cents., 9s. 2d. for three per cents., and 9s. 3d. for deferred.

No reasonable anticipation, at this juncture, of the progressive rise of stock could have carried it in so short a time to the height which it attained, or beyond the limits within which purchases were deemed advantageous. The rapid and extraordinary rise which did ensue was, in fact, artificial and violent, such as no discreet calculation of probabilities could have pre-supposed. It, therefore, cannot impeach the prudence or expediency of having made provision, on a different supposition, for an extension of purchases.

The proceeds of the bills which were drawn subsequent to May, only began to be collected about the beginning of February, and continued in collection until the 29th of March. On the 2d of February, the sum received amounted to no more than $13,431 33.

These last bills were drawn when the rapid rise of stock commenced, and were sold upon a credit of three months. It was a natural conjecture that a rise so sudden and violent could not be of long duration, and that a declension would shortly succeed, which would afford an opportunity of purchasing with advantage, and render the intervention of public purchases advantageous, in more than one respect. The event fully corresponded with the anticipation.

With regard to the bills drawn in April last, it has been stated that they were directed to be sold upon a credit of six months; that those drawn in July, August, and October, were made payable, one moiety in two, the other moiety in four months. Hence, with a moderate allowance for delay in the sales, the period contemplated by the arrangement for the commencement of receipts was the month of October, that for their consummation the month of February.

The inducements to the drawing of these bills have been stated. The present examination has relation merely to the question whether the Bank of the United States, by premeditation of this Department, or subsequent omissions, had enjoyed any undue advantage from the deposits of the proceeds of the bills at the end of the year 1792, the point of time to which this inquiry has reference.

The statement which has been made as to the time the moneys received to that period had remained in deposit might alone be relied upon as a sufficient answer. If delinquency can be attached to the non-employment of one or two hundred thousand dollars for a few weeks, in the money operations of a nation, it implies a minuteness of responsibility which could never be encountered with prudence, and never will be fulfilled in practice. The distractions of attention incident to a great and complicated scene of business, would alone disappoint the expectation.

But I have more than this to offer upon the present occasion. The opportunity for investing the moneys on hand, during the period in question, was not favorable. This was experienced by the Treasurer, in his endeavors to invest the fund arising from the interest on the purchased Debt. There was no part but the deferred which could be had at all within the limits prescribed. Several indications of an approaching season more advantageous for purchases were discernible, and a better employment of the money than at the then prices presented itself to the option of the Legislature. This mode of employing it formed, in my mind, part of a general plan for the regular redemption of the Public Debt, according to the right reserved to the Government. The one per cent. which might be saved was regarded as one means of constituting the proposed annuities.

Accordingly, on the 30th of November last, pursuant to a reference of the 22d of that month, and connected with the plan of redemption contemplated, I submitted to the House of Representatives a proposition for applying the moneys in question towards discharging the Debt which the Government owes to the Bank, and upon which an interest of six per cent. is payable. This was manifestly, at the time of the proposition, the most profitable use that could be made of the fund. It has been already stated that it would produce a saving, if extended to the whole two millions, worth to the Government an annual sum of twenty thousand dollars—equal to a capital of four hundred thousand dollars.

This proposition tended to accelerate the employment of the moneys on hand, in a way the most beneficial to the Government, and, consequently, to shorten the duration of the advantage to the banks of holding them by way of deposit. I submit it to the candor of the House, whether it be not full evidence that there was no disposition on my part to prolong to those institutions a benefit at the expense of the Government.

The proposition itself has not yet received the decision of the House.

Another ground upon which the suggestion of mismanagement and undue concession to the interest of the banks has been founded, respects the Domestic Loans which have been obtained. Those of them which have been made of the Bank of the United States are represented as unnecessary, tending to afford an emolument to that institution, for which the United States had no equivalent advantage.

It will conduce to a correct judgment of this matter to resume a point already touched upon, and to add here the further illustrations of it which have been promised, to wit: that it ought to be a general principle to have constantly in the command of the Treasury, at its different places of deposit, a sum of about $500,000—a principle, too, which must be understood with reference to the beginnings of the quarters of a year, when the chief public payments are made and making.

The following observations will apply generally to the balances which appear at the commencement of each quarter. The greatest part of the interest for the preceding quarter will have been then deducted, but a part is always in a different situation.

The payment of interest upon a Public Debt, at thirteen different places, is an operation as difficult and complicated as it is new. In carrying it into execution, it is of necessity to lodge, for some time previous to the expiration of each quarter, at several of the Loan Offices, drafts of the Treasurer for the sums estimated to be necessary at those offices, with blanks for the direction, and with liberty to the respective officers to dispose of them upon different places, as a demand accrues. This arrangement has an eye to two purposes—to avoid large previous accumulations at particular points; to facilitate the placing of the requisites where they are wanted, without the transportation of specie. The allowing of the drafts to be disposed of on several places gives larger scope to a demand for them, and renders them more easily saleable. But it is a consequence of this, that a part of the drafts are often not placed and brought into the accounts of the Treasurer until some time after the expiration of the quarter. The fund for them of course appears on hand until the transaction is completed.

Connected with the circumstance of paying the interest upon the Public Debt at different places is this further consequence: the transfers continually going on from one office to another render it impossible to know at any moment when provision for the payment of interest is to be made, what sum is requisite at each place. Estimate must supply the want of knowledge; and, to avoid dis-appointment anywhere, the estimate must always be large, and a correspondent sum placed in the power of the Commissioners. This circumstance alone requires an extra sum at the different places of payment, which ought not to be computed at less than $50,000.

Again: the sums payable on account of the Civil List, at the end of each quarter, which amount to about fifty thousand dollars, exclusive of what relates to the two Houses of Congress, are always in a course of payment for some time within the succeeding quarter. The fund for them, consequently, appears in the moneys on hand at the beginning of such quarter.

Again: there are constantly considerable arrears of existing appropriations, for which demands on the Treasury are at every moment possible; the times when they will be presented, and to what extent, at any given time, being in a great degree contingent. The arrears for the different objects of the War Department can seldom be estimated at less than $150,000.

It is presumed to be a clear principle that the Treasury ought to be always ready to face such arrears as may be claimed at every instant or within any short period. An hour's distress or embarrassment, to make good a public payment, already due, would be baneful to public credit. It has been a uniform maxim of the present administration of the Treasury never to risk such distress or embarrassment.

Independently, therefore, of the weighty consideration of being prepared (especially, with a war on hand, liable every moment to greater extension) for future casualties, the mere satisfaction of arrears ought to cause the constant reservation of a sum that would be moderately stated at half the sum which it has been alleged ought always to be in the Treasury. It is to be observed, that it does not often happen that the current receipts to be expected in any immediately succeeding quarter are likely to exceed the probable expenditure of the quarter. The reverse is as often the case. Hence the greater necessity of maintaining a constant surplus. There are still other considerations of weight, in a just estimate of the point in question.

The sum stated as necessary to be always in the command of the Treasury is never in fact at the Seat of the Government, where far the greatest part of the public disbursements are to be made. The depositories of it are the several banks from Charleston to Boston. The whole sum, therefore, can never be brought into immediate action for answering the claims upon the Treasury. No part can be properly viewed as in this situation beyond New York on the one side, and Baltimore on the other. Whatever part is more remote than those points ought not to be regarded as capable of being commanded in less time, upon an average, than sixty days, making allowance for the usual delays in the sale of bills, and the usual terms of credit, which experience has shown to be convenient.

In estimating the effective sum at any time on hand in the Bank of the United States, it is necessary to be known that a practice for the simplification of the Treasurer's bank account begun with the Bank of North America, has been continued with the Bank of the United States, of this nature: the bills drawn by the Treasurer upon distant places, and deposited with the Bank for sale, are immediately passed to his credit as cash, though they are allowed to be sold at credits from thirty to sixty days, and it is understood that the proceeds are not demandable of the Bank till they are collected. Hence, the apparent sum in the Bank of the United States is always greater than the real, sometimes to a large amount.

The deductions to be made for this circumstance are shown in the Treasurer's half-monthly statement of balances, No. 5, beginning with the 1st of June, 1792, and ending with the 1st of January, 1793. The period begun with is that when the first instalment of the Loan from the Bank was payable, and has been selected for this reason.

The propriety of these deductions appears to have been objected to, by anticipation, on two grounds—one, that the bills deposited answer all the purposes of cash, and ought to be credited as such, on the receipt of them; the other, that "there is a regular and constant influx of moneys into the Bank, by the operation of these bills, and that it is not very material whether a bill lodged in the Bank to-day should be paid to-day, provided something like the same sum should be paid in consequence of a bill lodged in Bank one or two months ago, and the bill of to-day should be paid one or two months hence."

Neither the one nor the other of these two positions is correct.

In no sense are the notes of the purchasers of the bills, which are taken payable in thirty, forty-five, and sixty days, the same thing to a bank as cash. It is evident it could not pay its own bills with those notes. In this primary particular, therefore, the comparison fails. Neither could it make discounts upon the basis of those notes as cash; because every discount gives a right to a borrower to call and receive in coin, if he pleases, the amount of the sum discounted. Notes are not coin, nor do they confer an equal power to pay. It is true, that a bank will, in its discounts, make some calculation on expected receipts; but it can never consider them as equivalent to cash in hand, nor operate upon them in any degree to the same extent as upon equal sums in cash. If notes payable at future periods were equivalent to cash, then every discount made by a bank would confer a facility to make another for an equal sum; for there is always a note deposited for the sum discounted, and the power of discounting might, by the mere exercise of it, become infinite. An hypothesis of this kind will never be acted upon by any prudent directors of a bank, and could not be long acted upon without ruin to the institution. It is to be observed, that the great profitable business of a bank consists in discounting.

There is but one light in which the position under examination is in any degree founded. It is this, that, were it not for the instrumentality of the bills, the specie of the Bank would be sometimes remitted for purposes which are answered by the bills. As often as this happens, they are a substitute to the Bank for cash, because they prevent equivalent sums from being carried away. But this only sometimes happens. In numerous instances, the enterprises to which the bills are subservient, would not be undertaken at all, were it not for the power of anticipation which the credits upon them afford. In many other instances, the bills of the Bank itself would be remitted instead of specie; in others, private bills would be substituted; in others, mutual credits between the merchants, to be liquidated in the course of mutual dealings, would supply the call. Hence it is only true that Treasury bills sometimes answer the purpose of cash to the Bank, whence it does not follow that they ought always to be considered and credited definitively as cash. It is also true, though in a less degree, that notes deposited with the Bank by individuals for collection, sometimes answer to it the purposes of cash; but it will be readily perceived that it would be inadmissible, as a general rule, to receive and credit them as such. The effect in both cases would be, that the Bank would make an advance of a present sum without interest, for a sum to be received in future.

An arrangement, indeed, has been for some time depending between the Bank of the United States and the Treasury, for securing to the Government the advantage of an immediate absolute credit for the bills deposited, as so much cash, to be coupled with some collateral accommodations to the Bank. But it has not yet been carried into effect. The fact heretofore has been as stated, and the reasoning, to be just, must proceed on that basis. The last of the two positions which have been cited, has still less foundation than the first.

A sum received to-day, for a bill deposited two months past, can in no view be deemed a substitute for the amount of a bill deposited to-day, to be received two months hence. It is to be remembered, that the amount of the first bill was itself credited at the time of the deposit; and that the sum received to-day on that account, can only realize the antecedent credit. It cannot represent, or be an equivalent for the future receipt upon a different bill. To affirm that it could, is to make one sum the representative of two. The consequence of the reasoning would be, that the Government ought to receive the money paid in to-day as a satisfaction, as well for the bill deposited to-day, as for that which was deposited two months past.

Making the proper deductions on account of the bills, the amount of the effective cash in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was, on the 1st of June, $587,091 11; in other banks, there was then also the further sum of $9,591 89, making, together, $596,683. The amount of the effective cash on the 2d of July, in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was $217,234 76; there were then also in the other banks, $184,998 85; making, together, $402,233 61. The amount of the effective cash on the 1st of October, in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was $244,394 27; there were then also in the other banks, $145,420 24; making, together, $389,814 51.

The deductions for bills at the several periods were, June 1st, $157,508 33; July 2d, $220,900; October 1st, $31,100; so that, including the bills at that epoch, the whole sum in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, amounted to no more than $275,494 27; the sums in the other banks, to $145,420 24.

Loans.

On the 1st of June, there were paid on account of the Debt to France, $100,000; the day following, the first instalment of $100,000 on account of the Loan from the Bank, was received. On the 30th of June, the second instalment of $100,000 was received. These two instalments, amounting to $200,000, are included in the sum of $217,234 76, which, on the 2d of July, constituted the cash in all the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore.

About the beginning of August, another instalment on account of the Loan of the Bank was received, and on the 29th of September, another, making, with the preceding ones, $400,000. This sum was involved in the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of October, which, it has been seen, did not exceed in the banks at and near the Seat of the Government, including even unsold and unpaid bills, $275,494 27; and comprehending the sums in all the other banks, amounted to no more than $420,914 51.

From the foregoing detail, it appears that, excluding the $200,000 received on Loan of the Bank of the United States in the month of June, there would have been, on the 2d of July, 1792, in the command of the Treasury at those places, from which immediate supplies may be derived, no greater sum than $17,234 76; that, excluding the $400,000 before that time received on Loan of the same Bank, there would have been on the 1st of October, 1792, an absolute deficiency within the scene described, of $124,505 73; that the whole balance then in the Treasury, whosoever deposited, amounted only to $420,914 51, and, excluding the Loan of the Bank, would not have been more than $20,914 51.

There must be some very radical error in my conceptions of the proper condition of the Treasury, if it was not in a sufficiently low state during the whole period under consideration; and if it be not demonstrated that the moneys taken of the Bank on Loan were necessary for the public service, and were obtained with a due regard to economy.

There are circumstances which still further manifest the attention which has been paid to this point. The powers given to make Loans for domestic purposes at different times, up to the 8th of May, 1792, comprehend an aggregate of $1,053,355 74; the sums which have been actually obtained upon interest, amount to no more than $455,000.

The contract upon which the $400,000 were obtained, was made the 25th of May, 1792, extending to $523,500, and contemplating the payment of $400,000 of that sum by the Bank, in equal monthly instalments, beginning on the 1st of June, and ending the 1st of September; the residue on the 1st of January, 1793.

Previous to the making of that contract, there had been stipulated to be paid, on account of the French Debt, for the supplies to St. Domingo, $400,000, of which one-fourth was paid in March, another fourth was payable on the 1st of June, another fourth on the 1st of September, another fourth on the 1st of December.

Loans.

Particular causes rendered it an accommodation to the agents of France, to postpone and subdivide the September instalment. A similar postponement took place with regard to the instalment payable by the Bank on the 1st of September, which was not demanded till the latter end of the month, and the remainder of the sum contracted for has not yet been demanded. The spirit of the precaution which secured to the public the privilege of making or forbearing its calls, according to circumstances, needs no comment.

There remain to be noticed two circumstances, which will serve to throw additional light upon the conduct which has been observed with regard to the sums from time to time kept on hand. A comparison of the sums in the Treasury, during the years 1791 and 1792, will contradict the idea of any disposition to suffer the public moneys to accumulate for the benefit of the Bank of the United States and its subdivisions, and will at the same time indicate the general rule which has governed. In this comparison, it is necessary to recollect that larger operations were to be performed in 1792.

It may be objected, that the rule laid down has been on several occasions exceeded. How this has happened at certain periods, has been explained. But there is a view of the subject which will throw further light upon it.

The sums which appear on hand at the end of any quarter, are always larger on a retrospective, than on a previous view. This proceeds from the following cause:

The judgment to be formed beforehand of the sums which will be received within any future period, must of necessity be regulated by the returns in the possession of the Treasury, at the time the examination is made. As these come forward with more or less punctuality, that judgment will be more or less accurate; but the appearance on the returns will always be short of the fact, because a certain number of returns, at any period of examination, will necessarily be deficient. What does not appear, must of course be essentially excluded from the calculation of the receipts to be expected within any near period; because the extent of the sums which may have accrued beyond those shown by the returns in hand, is unknown, and it is still more uncertain in what months the payments of them may fall; and the combinations of the Treasury, as to the means of fulfilling the demands upon it, ought to proceed as little as possible upon conjectures and uncertainties. Monthly abstracts of the bonds taken at each port, are the documents which serve to inform the Treasury of the progress of the receipts upon the duties of imports. From these a general abstract is made up once a month at the Treasury, for the information of the Head of the Department, showing the amount payable in each month. But very considerable differences appear from one month to another. The statement CZ will serve as an illustration. It contains a comparison of the sums shown by two successive abstracts, one of the 7th of November, the other of the 7th of December last, for a term of ten months, distributed into monthly subdivisions. The aggregate difference upon the whole term between the two abstracts, is $495,308 73; upon two months, beginning with November, and ending with December, it is $151,789 40; upon a quarter, beginning with January, and ending with March, it is $174,471 66; upon a subsequent quarter, it is $81,055 81; upon a still subsequent quarter, it is $87,991 86. Hence it is evident that an arrangement founded upon the abstract of the 7th of November, would suppose a receipt during any part of the time embraced by it, even the most proximate, considerably less than would appear by the abstract only one month later; and it must always happen, from this circumstance, that the actual receipts, while punctuality is preserved, will exceed the anticipations of them, and that greater balances will be found to exist at any given period, than could have been beforehand safely calculated or acted upon. This circumstance, duly considered, will be a further and powerful justification of the conduct pursued generally, in relation to the moneys from time to time kept on hand, and particularly with regard to the Loans of the Bank. Low as the state of the Treasury appears to have been on a retrospective view, when the moneys upon those Loans were called for, the prospect, at each time, must have presented the appearance of a less competent supply, or a greater deficiency, than was afterwards realized.

I am not sure but that I owe an apology to the House for taking up so much of its time in obviating the imputation of partiality or favoritism towards the banks. The aspect under which I view it, admonishes me that I may have annexed to it greater importance than was intended to be given to it by its authors.

That a disposition friendly to the accommodation of those institutions, as far as might be consistent with official duty and the public interest, has characterized the conduct of the Department, will not be denied. No man, placed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, whatever theoretic doubts he may have brought into it, would be a single month without surrendering those doubts to a full conviction, that banks are essential to the pecuniary operations of the Government. No man, having a practical knowledge of the probable resources of the country in the article of specie, (which he would with caution rate beyond the actual revenues of the Government,) would rely upon the annual collection of $4,500,000, without the instrumentality of institutions that give a continual impulse to circulation, and prevent the stagnation to be otherwise expected from locking up from time to time large sums for periodical disbursements, to say nothing of the accommodations which facilitate to the merchant the payment of the considerable demands made upon him by the Treasury. No man, practically acquainted with the pecuniary ability of individuals in this country, would count upon finding the means of those anticipations of the current revenue for the current service, which have been, and will be necessary, from any other source than that of the banks. No prudent administrator of the finances of the country, therefore, but would yield to the disposition which has been acknowledged as alike essential to the interest of the Government, and to the satisfactory discharge of his trust—a disposition which would naturally lead to good offices, within the proper and justifiable bounds.

After the explanation which has been offered, to manifest the necessity and propriety of the Loans made of the Bank, it can scarcely be requisite to enter into a refutation of the process by which it has been endeavored to establish that the Government pays 17 per cent. upon those Loans. The state of the Treasury rendered it expedient to borrow the sums which were borrowed; they have been duly received, and the rate of interest stipulated upon them is 5 per cent. The Government, then, pays upon them 5 per cent., and no more.

The history which was given in my last Letter, proves that the supposition from which the inference, of paying 17 per cent. upon the Domestic Loan, has been drawn, is erroneous. The balances on hand at the respective periods in question, are the residues of the moneys which had been received from every source, including the Loans, foreign and domestic.

But, if the supposition which appears to have been made had been true, it was still impossible that 17 per cent. could have been paid. By no construction can the rate be extended beyond 10. The mean interest of the money borrowed abroad, including charges, is 5 per cent.; the interest stipulated to be paid on the Loan from the Bank is also 5; the sum of the two is 10. It is immaterial for what purpose the Foreign fund was obtained, whether to pay to France or to purchase the Debt; the worst consequence that can result is double, not treble interest. The interest payable to France is payable for moneys borrowed and spent during the war. It can never be truly said, that that interest is now payable on any existing fund, whether borrowed in Holland or borrowed in the United States, or borrowed there and re-borrowed here. It can never serve to make an addition to the cost or charges of any such fund. It is payable upon one long since procured and used.

But it is not obvious how the supposition came to be entertained, that all the moneys drawn here from the Foreign fund, had been borrowed for the payment of the Debt to France. The presumption would seem to have been more natural, that they had been principally, if not wholly, introduced with a view to purchases of the Debt, and consequently had a more special reference to the act authorizing a Loan for that purpose. And the fact is, that this was the destination of far the greatest proportion of the sums drawn for. It has been stated that a part had an eye to the supplies to St. Domingo, and that another part was introduced with a view to the payment of the foreign officers.

The additional observations to which I shall request the attention of the House will apply to the course and state of the Sinking Fund, concerning which I transmitted with my last communication three statements, numbered I, II, and III.

To give a more collected view of this part of the subject, it may be of use to include here a recapitulation of some ideas which have been stated in other places.

It is the course and practice of the Department, for all public moneys, from whatever source proceeding, to pass into the Treasury, and there form a common mass, subject, under the responsibility of the officers of the Department, to the dispositions which have been prescribed by law.

The surplus at the end of the year 1790, appropriated to the Sinking Fund, amounting to $1,374,656 40, went, as it was received, into the Treasury.

All the proceeds of the bills drawn upon the Foreign fund, prior to April 1792, except the sum of $177,998 80, left in deposit with the Bank of North America, for reasons which have been explained, passed from time to time into the Treasury. The whole amount of the sums paid in is $907,294 23.

The proceeds of the bills drawn for, in, and subsequent to, April, 1792, have not yet passed into the Treasury, for reasons which have been likewise assigned. It would have been done before this time, as far as the receipts had gone, but for the present inquiry, which temporarily suspended it. I thought it best to make no alteration in the state of things as they stood when it began, at least till all the information desired had been given. Measures will now be taken for a settlement of the accounts, and for a transfer of the proceeds. The whole amount of those bills, paid and unpaid, including an estimated sum of interest, will be, as heretofore stated, $1,220,476 10. The whole amount of the bills drawn is $2,305,769 13.

Out of the Sinking Fund composed of the surplus of the revenue, to the end of 1790, and the proceeds of the Foreign bills, there were issued from the Treasury, and expended in purchases, to the end of 1792, $957,770 65.

For reasons which have been stated, it was finally deemed advisable to place those purchases wholly to the account of the surplus of 1790.

Consequently, there remained on the 1st of January, of the present year, $416,885 75, of the above mentioned surplus, unapplied to purchases; and the whole of the Foreign Fund, except the sum of $726,000, paid, and reserved to be paid, for the use of the Colony of St. Domingo, and the sum of $191,316 90 paid, and reserved to be paid, to the foreign officers, became free for future application. The balance of the proceeds of the bills, after deducting for those reservations, is $1,388,452 22.

Since the 1st of January, 1793, there have been issued, on account of the Foreign Fund, for purchases, $284,901 89.

The practice has uniformly been, not to separate any of the moneys belonging to the Sinking Fund, from the common mass of the moneys in the Treasury, but in proportion to the occasions of investing them in purchases.

Hence the sum of $957,770 65, issued previous to the present year, and the sum of $284,901 89 included the present year, making, together, $1,242,-

Loans.

672 54, are all the moneys which have been ever separated from the common mass of the Treasury, for the purpose of the Sinking Fund; the whole of which, except $49,282 74, have been actually expended in purchases.

The unapplied sum remains deposited in the Bank of the United States, except a small balance of $61 76 in the hands of William Heth.

From the above rule, the part of the Sinking Fund arising from interest on the Debt extinguished by purchases or otherwise, is to be excepted. The practice hitherto, has been to include this interest in the general dividend of each quarter, and the warrant issued to the cashier of the Bank for paying it. The statement No. 3, accompanying my last letter, shows the application of this fund hitherto.

The law directs that this fund shall be invested within thirty days after each quarter. This provision began to take effect on the 1st of July last. But the investments were not made within the respective times prescribed. This proceeded partly from the state of the market, and partly from the regulations adopted by the Commissioners, who were the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Their regulations, applying to the two first quarters, limited the prices to certain rates, and prescribed the mode of sealed proposals. The Treasurer was appointed agent for the Commissioners. The proposals, with regard to the first quarter, were receivable till 28th of July inclusively; none were offered, as the Treasurer reported to me, and nothing was done.

The experiment of sealed proposals was again tried the second quarter, with somewhat more, though with but little success. The restriction to this mode of proceeding was rescinded, on the last day of the thirty allowed for purchasing, and some further purchases were made, but the whole sum invested was only $25,969 96.

The residue of this fund, except some small sums noted at foot of statement No. 3, was in January past.

The unapplied part of the surplus of 1790 having been expended in aid of the receipts of 1791, according to the provision which was made for that purpose, will remain suspended until the future receipts shall so far exceed the current disbursements as to produce a surplus for replacing it. In computing the amount of the unapplied Foreign Fund, it is necessary to take into the account the payments made from it during the years 1791 and 1792, on account of the interest of the Foreign Debt.

Provision having been made for paying this interest out of the Domestic revenues, the sums which have been paid on that account, from the Foreign Fund, are to be considered in the same light as if they had been transferred here by drafts. The amount paid at Amsterdam is one million six hundred thirty-three thousand one hundred and eighty-nine guilders and two shillings, equal at 3 64-11 ninetieths per guilder, to $653,874 34.

There will be additions to be made, which are not at present ascertained.

Adding this sum to the proceeds of the bills, and deducting the sums paid and to be paid for St. Domingo, and the foreign officers, and those applied to purchases during the present year, there will remain a sum of $1,763,424 68, subject to a future application.

Of this sum, $1,715,098 11 will be properly applicable to the purchase of the Debt. But circumstances may render it eligible to appropriate a part of it towards the discharge of the Foreign Debt.

From the plan which has been pursued, it is also liable to this application.

I have the honor to annex to the statements heretofore transmitted, those in the printed schedules marked A, B, and C.

A, exhibits the relative state of revenue and appropriations, to the end of 1792. B, the relative state of appropriations and expenditures to the same period; showing the balance unsatisfied of each head of appropriation. C, applies these statements to an explanation of the demands or charges upon the excess of income, beyond the disbursements, to the end of 1792.

In addition to these are two statements, marked D and E.

D, showing what proportion of the balances unsatisfied of the several appropriations are likely to be real expenditures, and what part are not likely to be so. In this, however, in several instances, probability must guide, the nature of the thing not admitting of certainty.

E, showing the cash on and upon the first of January last, and likely to be received from that day to the first of April next, and the sums paid and payable during that period.

The result, founded upon facts, contradicts very essentially that statement, which aims at showing the ability of the Treasury, besides defraying the current expenses of the quarter, to pay off two millions to the Bank; still leaving a balance in favor of the Treasury of $664,263 54.

It shows that, after satisfying the demands for which the Treasury is bound to be prepared, including a payment to the Bank of only one-tenth part of the $2,000,000, of which the statement alluded to supposes the complete payment, there would remain a balance in favor of the Treasury of no more than $664,180 89.*

It could answer no valuable purpose to delay the House with a particular examination of the various misapprehensions which have led to a result so different from the true one. It will be sufficient, as an example, to state a single instance. It is assumed as an item in the calculation, that a sum of a million of dollars will come into the Treasury by the first of April, on account of the revenue of the current year; while the probability is, that the sum received may not exceed ten thousand dollars; this presumption of a million is evidently founded upon two mistakes.

1st. It proceeds on the basis of an annual revenue of four millions of dollars, and supposes this sum equally distributed between the different quarters of the year, a million to each quarter; when,

* The sum here mentioned was omitted, through hurry, to be inserted in the original, the blank is here filled conformably to the statement E.

Loans.

in fact, there are two seasons of the year incomparably more productive than the other parts of it, viz: Those portions of the Spring and Fall which are embraced by the second and third quarters; the first and fourth being far less productive.

2d. It supposes all the duties which accrue are immediately paid; whereas the cases of prompt payment are confined to those in which the duties on particular articles imported in one vessel, by one person or co-partnership, do not exceed fifty dollars; in all other instances, a credit not less than four months is allowed, which carries the payment on the importations, upon the very first day of the quarter, a month beyond the expiration of it.

If the whole amount of the duties, which accrue during the first quarter of 1792, in cash and bonds, was no more than $307,163 84, adding one seventh for the additional duties, it ought, by analogy, to be the first quarter of the present year, $322,472 94; less, in totality, than the sum which it has been computed would be actually in money in the Treasury, by $677,527 06; and less, by the whole million, nearly, than will probably be in money in the Treasury on that account.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Estimate of the expenditures for the Civil List of the United States, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and Offices, for the year 1793.

[Published by the order of the House of Representatives, and referred to in the Secretary's Report of November 20, ante page 1162.]

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the House of Representatives the estimates herewith sent, marked A, B, and C.

The first, relating to the Civil List, or the expenditure for the support of Government during the year 1793, including the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and Offices, amounting to $352,466 33

The second, relating to certain deficiencies in former appropriations for the support of Government, to a provision in aid of the fund heretofore established for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, witnesses, &c., to the support of the light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, and to certain other purposes specified therein 92,599 66

The third, relating to the War Department, showing the probable expenditure of that Department for the year 1793, including a sum of $92,245 32 for pensions to invalids 1,171,719 05

Amounting, together, to 1,616,785 10

The funds out of which appropriations may be made for the foregoing purposes, are: 1st. The sum of $600,000 reserved annually for the support of Government out of the duties on imports and tonnage, by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. 2d. The surplus which may remain unexpended, of the sums appropriated to the use of the War Department for the year 1792. 3d. The unappropriated surplus of the existing revenues to the end of the year 1793; which funds, it is believed, will prove adequate to the object, as is illustrated in the schedule herewith transmitted, marked D. But as some deficiency may possibly happen, and as partial anticipations of the revenue will probably be requisite to face the demands for the public service, as they accrue, it appears to be essential that a power to borrow should accompany the grant.

The Secretary begs leave also to present, for the information of the House of Representatives, two statements (marked E and F) of the expenditure of two several sums: one of $50,000, and the other of $3,000, heretofore appropriated "towards discharging such demands on the United States, not otherwise provided for, as should have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which should be of a nature according to the course thereof, to require payment in specie."

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

NOTES.

(a) This sum is estimated by adding to the ascertained product of the year 1791 an ascertained excess of the product of the first two quarters of the year 1792, beyond the product of the first two quarters of the year 1791, being $252,319 11, and the estimated product for a half year of the additional duties on imports laid during the last session of Congress, and commencing on the 1st of July last, being $261,750. According to the information hitherto received at the Treasury, there is every probability that the amount of the duties for the last half-year of 1792 will fully equal this calculation of their product, if the ratio of the first half-year will exceed it.

(b) This estimate proceeds on the basis of the product of 1792, making a compromise of two considerations—one, an increase which may be expected equal to the difference between a whole and a half-year's product of the additional duties above mentioned; the other, a decrease which may arise from a defalcation of the duties on foreign spirits, in consequence of the increase of domestic distillation. There is good ground to conclude that the sum stated will rather fall short of than exceed the actual product.

(c) This branch of the revenue is not yet in complete order, but enough is ascertained, by actual returns, to afford a moral certainty that the product cannot be materially less than is here stated.

(d) This surplus is thus deduced:
The total appropriation for the War Department for the year 1792 is - - - - - $1,081,146 68
The total expenditure to the 27th of October was - - - - - $690,796 00
The sum at that time estimated by the Secretary of War to be further necessary - - - - - 218,950 00 to the end of the year, exclusive of provision supplies, is - - - - - 30,000 00
For provisions and contingencies may be stated a further sum of - - - - - 939,746 00

Balance which will probably remain unexpended - - - - - 141,400 68

Some inconsiderable appropriations for particular purposes are unnoticed, because certain casual funds will probably nearly, if not altogether, balance them.

GENERAL ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 15, 1793.

Mr. GILES, from the committee, to whom was recommended the Report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, together with the documents relating thereto, including the Letter from the Secretary of War and the memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, have proceeded to re-examine the documents formerly before them, as far as seemed necessary; to hear and examine other testimony, produced to them; to hear and consider the written communications, made by the Secretary of War, Samuel

Hodgdon, and the Commander-in-chief of the expedition; and, as the result of their further inquiries make the following supplementary Report:

The original report commences in the following words:

"The contract for the supplies of the Army on the route from Fort Pitt was made by Theodosius Fowler with the Secretary of the Treasury, and bears date the twenty-eighth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety; that at the same time a bond in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with Walter Livingston and John Cochran, securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract; that, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of War; that by letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the twenty-fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments."

From documents received by the Committee, since their last appointment, it appears that the copy of the before mentioned transfer was not lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury until the seventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; at which time it was received by the Secretary of the Treasury, under cover of a letter from William Duer, informing him of the circumstance of the said transfer, and making requisitions for certain advances of money. That the Secretary of the Treasury, by letter in reply of the same date, agrees to make the advances required to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

It appears that all the warrants issued from the Treasury, for the purposes of this contract, were issued to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the Committee with the written opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, and several other lawyers of eminence, all of whom concur in opinion, that the securities to the bond, originally given by Theodosius Fowler, for the execution of this contract, are now responsible for all damages, consequent upon any breach of that contract.

The Secretary of War, who alone appears to have been the agent on the part of the United States, in all things relating to the execution of the contract, has always corresponded with William Duer, as the contractor, and his correspondence commences at a date prior to that of the copy of the contract lodged at the Treasury.

The original report proceeds—

"That, on the sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary of War, for supplying the troops with provisions, until their arrival at Fort Pitt, and at Fort Pitt. A bond was, at the same time, entered into, by the said William Duer, for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatever."

It appears, by a re-examination of the documents formerly before the Committee, that the date and terms of the last mentioned contract were misrepresented; the date being the twenty-sixth, instead of the sixth of April, and the terms of the contract being to furnish provisions for the troops until their arrival at Fort Pitt, but not during their continuance at that place. The first of these mistakes appears to have been merely casual; the second appears to have arisen from paying greater attention to the manner in which the contract was really executed, than to the terms of the contract itself; it having been conceived by the Committee that Colonel Neville, the agent for supplying the troops during their continuance at Fort Pitt, acted "under the last mentioned contract." This circumstance is rendered the less material, from the consideration, that according to the plan of campaign, no delay of the troops at Fort Pitt was counted upon. The statement is otherwise correct.

The Secretary of War, in his communication, states that it was not the custom of the office to require other security than that of the contractor, for the due execution of contracts of small amount; and it appears by a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, written since the former report, that the Secretary of War consulted with him upon the occasion alluded to, and that he agreed in opinion, that further security was not necessary. It is stated in the original report, after speaking of one of the contractor's agents, that—

"It appears by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on the eighth of May, and it appears that on the twenty-third of March, there was advanced to William Duer, on the last mentioned contract, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars."

Upon re-examining the letters of John Kean, it appears that he had received the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, and no more, before the aforesaid eighth day of May, which was before overlooked by the Committee. And it appears from documents received by the Committee since their report, that the sum of fifty thousand dollars was not advanced to William Duer on account of the last mentioned contract, on the twenty-third of March. The Committee were led into this mistake by a document received from the Treasurer, representing the fact as stated in the original report; which document is still before the Committee. The true state of this transaction as recently stated, appears to be as follows:

A warrant issued in favor of Joseph Howell, on the twenty-third of March, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, for the use of the War Department generally, and not for William Duer, as stated in the account rendered by the Treasurer; of which sum, were advanced to William Duer, on the twenty-sixth of March, four thousand dollars; on the eighth day of May following, were paid to James Smith, contracting agent for William Duer, one thousand dollars; and between the twenty-first of May and the twenty-third of July, were paid to John Kean, another agent for William Duer, four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents—making the whole sum advanced on the last mentioned contract, five thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents. The residue of the fifteen thousand dollars is suggested to have been applied to the use of the War Department generally.

The original report states that—

"It appears from the correspondence of General Butler, from the ninth of May to the ninth of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Military Stores departments, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp kettles, cartridge boxes, pack-saddles, &c., all of which articles were deficient in quantity and bad in quality. The pack-saddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use."

Mr. Hodgdon has produced to the Committee a number of ex-parte affidavits and certificates to prove that these several articles were furnished in sufficient quantities, and of good quality. Most of these affidavits, however, were made by the manufacturers of the respective articles, or persons in the employment of Mr. Hodgdon, and generally written in a different handwriting from that of the subscribing deponents, and most of the certificates by persons unknown to the Committee. But the testimony formerly taken by the Committee, and the corroboration of it by the evidence of respectable and disinterested persons, lately taken by the Committee, in presence of Mr. Hodgdon, appears abundantly sufficient to justify the statement of facts contained in the original report. With respect to the pack-saddles, however, it is necessary to remark, that some qualification of the expression used in the original report would be proper. They appear to have been made of different sizes; those of the largest size are proved to have been wholly unfit for use, the horses used for pack-horses being generally small. Some of the smaller pack-saddles, however, appear to have been used in the campaign, and to have answered the intended purpose better than was at first expected.

It is stated in the original report that—

"The arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use, which circumstance rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt."

The Committee are led to conclude, from authentic information recently received, that the complaint of the arms intended for the regular troops and levies, is unfounded; some of the arms appear to have been damaged, after they were put into the hands of the troops, from their inexperience or carelessness, though delivered to them in good order.

The Committee were induced to make the unqualified statement contained in the original report, from the unqualified manner in which this subject is spoken of by some of the witnesses, formerly examined by the Committee; they not having stated with sufficient precision the causes of the arms being out of repair, nor specifying the probable number requiring repairs.

The original report proceeds with the following expression:

"It appears that a great proportion of the powder, supplied for the use of the Army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson, at Fort Pitt, with a howitzer, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder."

The Committee are satisfied from experiments made since the original report by Captain Ford, at Fort Washington, upon request of the Secretary of War, and by samples of the powder from thence, actually furnished the Committee, that the powder was originally of good quality; but that a certain quantity of it was damaged by exposure to the air and moisture after being issued to the troops. And it appears to have been powder of this description, upon which experiments were made by some of the officers in the expedition, which produced unfavorable impressions as to the quality of the powder in general; for it is certain, a belief was currently entertained amongst the officers, that the powder in general was not of good quality. The insufficiency of the powder, after the Army took the field, is accounted for from the bad quality of the tents. It is in testimony to the Committee, that great quantities of the fixed ammunition were actually rendered useless from that cause.

It is stated in the original report that—

"Mr. Hodgdon was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the fourth of June, he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived on the tenth of the same month; no sufficient causes have appeared to the Committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the Army appeared to have been essentially necessary previously to that time."

In this statement, the duration of Mr. Hodgdon's stay at Fort Pitt was casually omitted, which appears to have been from the tenth of June, till the twenty-sixth of August. The insertion of this fact will sufficiently explain the sense of the Committee in the inference respecting the time in which the presence of the Quartermaster General was necessary at the Army.

It is stated in the original report that—

"There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms at Fort Washington, on the first of June, and most of those totally out of repair."

These arms, the precise number of which appears not to be accurately ascertained, are admitted by the Secretary of War to have been at Fort Washington in the situation described, but he suggests that they were old and useless arms, which had been collected at that place, and were not counted upon as any part of the supply of arms for the expedition. It appears that the regular troops and levies were completely supplied with arms, without recurrence to this stock; but a number of them was repaired, by orders of the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, with a view, as he suggests, to arm the militia from Kentucky, who, it was expected, would arrive, either insufficiently armed, or not armed at all; and he did not conceive the arrangements, made by the War Department, competent to arming the militia, together with the other troops.

The original report states that—

"The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without farther pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service, and bearing endorsements, that some advances had been made to them on account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations; the real sums due on the notes were various—from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for one dollar, or one gallon of whiskey. The moneys for the pay of the levies did not leave Philadelphia till the fourth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, nor arrive at Fort Washington, till the third of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, some time after the last enlisted levies are known to have been entitled to their discharges."

In addition to the reasons contained in the original report, respecting the discharging of the levies, without their stipulated pay, which are admitted by the Secretary of War to have been justly stated, he has, in his late communication, suggested to the Committee, that, at the time of the discharge of the levies there was actually, in the hands of the Quartermaster General, the sum of sixteen thousand two hundred and ninety-two dollars and seventy cents, which were subject to be applied to any object, agreeably to the discretion of the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, and might have been applied, if he thought proper, to the payment of the discharged levies, and would have been sufficient for two months pay to the officers, and four months pay to the privates. This sum is admitted by the Quartermaster General to have been in his hands at the time of the discharge of the levies, and would have been applied to their pay if orders had been given by the Commander-in-chief of the expedition for that purpose; but that no such orders ever were received by him. The Secretary of War infers, from these circumstances, that to censure should be imputed to the War Department for not having paid implicit attention to this subject.

The circumstances respecting this transaction have been attentively examined by the Committee, and appear to them to be the following: The Quartermaster General, upon his leaving Philadelphia, was furnished with the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the use of that Department. He was afterwards furnished with two other sums, to wit: the sum of seventeen thousand eight hundred and forty-four dollars and fifty cents, on the twenty-third of July; and the sum of two thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty cents, on the seventh day of July—making, together, the sum of twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and ten cents. It appears by letter from the Secretary of War to the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, that five thousand dollars of this sum were to be applied to the pay of the regular troops, if the Commander-in-chief should deem that a proper application of the money; which, however, was not done. The remaining part of this money was intended to form a kind of military chest, to answer contingent expenses, subject, however, to the control of the Commander-in-chief. It appears that the

there was no Paymaster to the Army, nor any person authorized to settle the accounts of the soldiers, and ascertain the real balances due to them, until the arrival of Mr. Swann, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and infers that he had no authority to direct a settlement and order pay to the soldiers, until he was informed of the arrangements made at the War Office relatively to that object. This suggestion is strongly confirmed by a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the Commander-in-chief, and forwarded by Mr. Swann, which designates Mr. Swann as Paymaster, and contains instructions relatively to the terms of settling the accounts of the soldiery. The same letter serves to show that the twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and ten cents, put into the possession of the Quartermaster General, were not conclusively destined for the pay of the levies, nor so considered by the Secretary of War. Because it is asserted in the letter, that Mr. Swann is furnished with a sum of money sufficient for the whole pay of the levies, without making any deduction in consequence of the moneys furnished the Quartermaster General.

It is asserted by the Secretary of War in his communication to the Committee, that the time of the service of the levies did not expire until after the arrival of Mr. Swann at Fort Washington, particularly Gaither's and Rhea's battalions, the term of their enlistments having been to serve six months after their arrival at Fort Washington, which was deemed the place of rendezvous. The time which has elapsed from the period of enlistment to their arrival at Fort Washington, or the evident impropriety of annexing such a condition to the enlistments, caused the condition itself to be dispensed with; and those levies were actually discharged shortly after the twelfth of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, in consequence of having served six months, which is the extent of the service authorized by law, and actually received certificates at that time of having performed six months service.

Upon a re-examination of the residue of the original report, and the evidence now before the Committee, they are satisfied with the same, and find no material alterations or corrections necessary.

A regard for candor has induced the Committee to adopt this mode of reporting; because the original report is thereby preserved, mistakes existing in the same, and which are now corrected, and the causes of those mistakes rendered obvious, and the whole subject presented to view, upon the fairest terms, in the opinion of the Committee, to all persons in any degree concerned therein.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF SUPREME COURT.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a copy of a Letter and representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties, according to the present Judiciary system.

A copy of a Letter from the Judges attending the Circuit Court of the United States for the North Carolina district, in June last, containing their observations on an act passed during the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions." GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, Nov. 7, 1792.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 9, 1792.

SIR: Your official connexion with the Legislature, and the consideration that applications from us to them cannot be made in any manner so respectful to Government as through the President, induce us to request your attention to the enclosed representation, and that you will be pleased to lay it before the Congress.

We really, sir, find the burdens laid upon us so excessive that we cannot forbear representing them in strong and explicit terms.

On extraordinary occasions we shall always be ready, as good citizens, to make extraordinary exertions; but while our country enjoys prosperity, and nothing occurs to require or justify such exertions, we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of existing in exile from our families, and of being subjected to a kind of life on which we cannot reflect without experiencing sensations and emotions more easy to conceive than proper for us to express.

With the most perfect respect, esteem, and attachment, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Chief Justice and the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court respectfully represent to the Congress of the United States:

That when the present judicial arrangements took place, it appeared to be a general and well-founded opinion, that the act then passed was to be considered rather as introducing a temporary expedient than a permanent system, and that it would be revised as soon as a period of greater leisure should arrive. The subject was new, and was rendered intricate and embarrassing by local as well as other difficulties; and there was reason to presume that others, not at that time apparent, would be discovered by experience. The ensuing sessions of Congress were so occupied by other affairs of great and pressing importance, that the Judges thought it improper to interrupt the attention of Congress by any application on the subject. That, as it would not become them to suggest what alterations or system ought in their opinion to be formed and adopted, they omit making any remarks on that head; but they feel most sensibly the necessity which presses them to re-present—

That the task of holding twenty-seven Circuit Courts a year, in the different States, from New Hampshire to Georgia, besides two sessions of the Supreme Court at Philadelphia, in the two most severe seasons of the year, is a task which, considering the extent of the United States, and the small number of Judges, is too burdensome. That to require of the Judges to pass the greater part of their days on the road, and at inns, and a distance from their families, is a requisition which, in their opinion, should not be made unless in cases of necessity. That some of the present Judges do not enjoy health and strength of body sufficient to enable them to undergo the toilsome journeys through different climates and seasons, which they are called upon to undertake; nor is it probable that any set of Judges, however robust, would be able to support, and punctually execute, such severe duties for any length of time. That the distinction made between the Supreme Court and its Judges, and appointing the same men finally to correct in one capacity the errors which they themselves may have committed in another, is a distinction unfriendly to impartial justice, and to that confidence in the Supreme Court which it is so essential to the public interest should be reposed in it. The Judges decline minute details, and purposely omit many considerations, which they are persuaded will occur whenever the subject is attentively discussed and considered. They most earnestly request that it may meet with early attention, and that the system may be so modified as that they may be relieved from their present painful and improper situation.

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

NEWBURN, NORTH CAROLINA, June 8, 1792.

SIR: We, the Judges now attending at the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of North Carolina, conceive it our duty to lay before you some important observations which have occurred to us in the consideration of an act of Congress lately passed, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

We beg leave to premise, that it is as much an inclination as it is our duty to receive with all possible respect every act of the Legislature, and that we never can find ourselves in a more painful situation than to be obliged to object to the execution of any, more especially to the execution of one founded on the purest principles of humanity and justice, which the act in question undoubtedly is.

But, however lamentable a difference in opinion really may be, or with whatever difficulty we may have formed an opinion, we are under the indispensable necessity of acting according to the best dictates of our own judgment, after duly weighing every consideration that can occur to us, which we have done on the present occasion. The extreme importance of the case, and our desire of being explicit beyond the danger of being misunderstood, will, we hope, justify us in stating our observations in a systematic manner. We, therefore, sir, submit to you the following:

1. That the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Departments are each formed in a separate and independent manner, and that the ultimate basis of each is the Constitution only, within the limits of which each Department can alone justify any act of authority.

2. That the Legislature, among other important powers, unquestionably possess that of establishing Courts in such a manner as to their wisdom shall appear best, limited by the terms of the Constitution only; and to whatever extent that power may be exercised, or however severe the duty they may think proper to require, the Judges, when appointed in virtue of any such establishment, owe implicit and unreserved obedience to it.

3. That, at the same time, such Courts cannot be warranted, as we conceive, by virtue of that part of the Constitution delegating Judicial power for the exercise of which any act of the Legislature is provided, in exercising (even under the authority of another act) any power not in its nature Judicial, or, if Judicial, not provided for upon the terms the Constitution requires.

4. That whatever doubt may be suggested, whether the power in question is properly of a Judicial nature, yet inasmuch as the decision of the Court is not made final, but may be at least suspended in its operation by the Secretary of War, if he shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, this subjects the decision of the Court to a mode of revision which we consider to be unwarranted by the Constitution; for, though Congress may certainly establish, in instances not yet provided for, Courts of appellate jurisdiction, yet such Courts must consist of Judges appointed in the manner the Constitution requires, and holding their offices by no other tenure than that of their good behaviour, by which tenure the office of Secretary of War is not held; and we beg leave to add, with all due deference, that no decision of any Court of the United States can, under any circumstances, in our opinion, agreeably to the Constitution, be liable to a reversion, or even suspension, by the Legislature itself, in whom no Judicial power of any kind appears to be vested but the important one relative to impeachments.

These, sir, are our reasons for being of opinion, as we are at present, that this Circuit Court cannot be justified in the execution of that part of the act which requires it to examine, and report an opinion on the unfortunate cases of officers and soldiers disabled in the service of the United States. The part of the act requiring the Court to sit five days for the purpose of receiving applications from such persons, we shall deem it our duty to comply with; for, whether in our opinion such purpose can or cannot be answered, it is, as we conceive, our indispensable duty to keep open any Court of which we have the honor to be Judges, as long as Congress shall direct.

The high respect we entertain for the Legislature, our feelings as men for persons whose situation requires the earliest as well as the most effectual relief, and our sincere desire to promote, whether officially or otherwise, the just and benevolent views of Congress so conspicuous on the present as well as on many other occasions, have induced us to reflect whether we could be justified in acting under this act personally in the character of Commissioners during the session of a Court; and could we be satisfied that we had authority to do so, we would cheerfully devote such part of our time as might be necessary for the performance of the service. But we confess we have great doubts on this head. The power appears to be given to the Court only, and not to the Judges of it; and as the Secretary of War has not a discretion in all instances, but only in those where he has cause to suspect imposition or mistake, to withhold a person recommended by the Court from being named on the pension list, it would be necessary for us to be well persuaded we possessed such an authority before we exercised a power which might be a means of drawing money out of the public Treasury, as effectually as an express appropriation by law. We do not mean, however, to preclude ourselves from a very deliberate consideration whether we can be warranted in executing the purposes of the act in that manner, in case an application should be made.

No application has yet been made to the Court, or to ourselves individually, and, therefore, we have had some doubts as to the propriety of giving an opinion in a case which has not yet come regularly and judicially before us. None can be more sensible than we are of the necessity of Judges being, in general, extremely cautious in not intimating an opinion in any case extra-judicially, because we well know how liable the best minds are, notwithstanding their utmost care, to a bias which may arise from a preconceived opinion, even unguardedly, much more deliberately given. But in the present instance, as many unfortunate and meritorious individuals, whom Congress have justly thought proper objects of immediate relief, may suffer very great distress even by a short delay, and may be utterly ruined by a long one, we determined at all events to make our sentiments known as early as possible, considering this as a case which must be deemed an exception to the general rule upon every principle of humanity and justice; resolving, however, that so far as we are concerned individually, in case an application should be made, we will most attentively hear it; and if we can be convinced this opinion is a wrong one, we shall not hesitate to act accordingly, being as far from the weakness of supposing that there is any reproach in having committed an error, to which the greatest and best men are sometimes liable, as we should be from so low a sense of duty as to think it would not be the highest and most deserved reproach that could be bestowed on any man (much more on Judges) that they were capable, from any motive, of persevering against conviction in apparently maintaining an opinion which they really thought to be erroneous.

We take the liberty to request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this Letter before the Legislature of the United States at their next session, and have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient and most faithful servants,

JAMES IREDELL,
One of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.
JNO. SITGREAVES,
Judge of the United States for the North Carolina District.
THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT ON NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

[Made to the House of Representatives, second session Second Congress.]

The Committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transportation of Newspapers, Report:

That after a communication with the Postmaster General, on the subject under consideration, they beg leave to recommend the following provisions:

1. That the Postmaster General be authorized to direct his deputies to receive subscriptions for newspapers.

2. That every subscriber, at the time of subscribing, pay to the postmaster the amount of a half year's postage on the paper which he engages to take, and half of the annual price of the paper.

3. That of the postage thus advanced, he retain one-fourth of a cent for each paper he will have to receive or deliver, during the first half year; and of the price of the paper, twenty-five per cent.; and remit the residue of the postage to the General Post Office, and the residue of the price of the papers to the printers thereof, with lists of the subscribers.

4. That the postmasters, and not the subscribers, shall be responsible to the printers; they receiving the twenty-five per cent., before mentioned, as compensation for the above intended agency in the business.

They suggest the propriety of securing the printers' money, by the same bonds, of the postmasters, by which postages are secured. That duplicate lists of the subscribers should be sent by the postmasters to the General Post Office; and that, upon the complaint of a printer, against a postmaster, payment may be enforced, under the same bond that secures arrears of postage to the office.

That where the mail shall be carried by private contract, agreeably to the power given to the Postmaster General, by the second section of the law "establishing Post Offices and Post Roads," it may be lawful for the Postmaster General to allow to such contractors, in a settlement with the General Post Office, for the postage on newspapers, a proportion, according to the distance by them carried, and the distance by the public post, so as to make a just dividend, according to the distances carried by each.

That the privilege of franking letters or packets, not exceeding the weight of one ounce, be allowed to postmasters, under restrictions similar to those of the law of last session.

That the postmasters be allowed to charge — per centum on all franked letters, their own excepted, considering them as single letters.

That the Postmaster General be empowered, in the settlement of the account of the deputy postmaster of Philadelphia, to allow him, for office rent and a chief clerk, at the rate of not more than — dollars; and one other clerk, at the rate of not more than — dollars per annum.

That when letters or packets, to go beyond sea, are received by a postmaster, it shall be his duty to make them up into mails; and for each letter or packet be permitted to receive one cent.

That any letter sent among newspapers be subjected to double postage; and where a memorandum or writing, other than the address, be on the newspaper, such newspaper be subjected to double letter postage.

That magazines and pamphlets be transported in the mail, at the following rates:

One cent per sheet for their conveyance not over fifty miles; one and a half cent over fifty and not exceeding one hundred miles; and two cents per sheet for any greater distance.

That members of Congress be allowed to frank letters or packets not exceeding four ounces in weight.

That it be made the duty of the masters or commanders of ships or vessels, sailing from one port of the United States to another, whether by sea or otherwise, as well as of the masters or commanders of all ships or vessels arriving in any port of the United States, from a foreign port or place, to deliver all letters by them brought, to the post office of the port or place, where they may arrive, in — hours after such arrival.

The Committee recommend the following roads as necessary, viz:

A road to connect Sharpsburg, in Maryland, with Shepherdstown, in Virginia.

An alteration of the route from Philadelphia to Reading, so that the road to be established may be from Philadelphia, through Norristown and Pottsgrove, to Reading.

To connect Norwich and New London, in Connecticut, by a road.

That the Postmaster General be authorized to send a mail, by the route of Newport, to Taunton.

That there be established a road from Hampton Falls to Exeter, in New Hampshire.

One from Yorktown, Pennsylvania, to Fredericktown, in Maryland.

One from Richmond, by Powhatan Courthouse, Cumberland Courthouse, Meredith's Store, New London, and Liberty, to Botetourt Courthouse in Virginia; and from New London to Lynnhburg; and from Meredith's Store, by Prince Edward Courthouse, to Charlotte Courthouse.

One from Tarborough, by Greenville, to Washington; and from Fayetteville to Hillsborough, by Chatham Courthouse; and to return by Wake Courthouse to Fayetteville, once a week; in North Carolina: and One from Danville to Lexington, in Kentucky.

The Committee recommend that the road from Halifax, by Bluntsville, Williamstown, and Daley's, to Plymouth, in North Carolina, be stricken out.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT PHILADELPHIA, ON THE TWENTY-FOURTH OF OCTOBER, 1791.

An Act granting further time for making return of the Enumeration of the Inhabitants in the District of South Carolina.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the Marshal of the District of South Carolina to complete and make return of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the said district to the President of the United States, in the form and manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," at any time on or before the first day of March next, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

JONATHAN TRUMBULL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS,

Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Approved, November 8, 1791.

GEORGE WASHINGTON,

President of the United States.

An Act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the service of the year 1792, and the support of the Civil List of the United States, including the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices thereof, there shall be appropriated a sum of money, not exceeding three hundred and twenty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty-three dollars and fifty-six cents, that is to say:

For the compensation granted by law to the President of the United States, the Vice President, Chief Justice, Associate Judges, and Attorney General, fifty-three thousand dollars.

For the like compensation to the District Judges, nineteen thousand eight hundred dollars.

For the like compensations to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the officers and attendants of the two Houses, estimated on a session of six months continuance, and including the traveling expenses of the members, one hundred and twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and thirty dollars.

For the like compensations to the Secretary and officers of the several Departments of the Treasury of the United States, including clerks and attendants, and the salaries of the respective Loan officers, sixty thousand three hundred dollars.

For the like compensations to the Secretary and officers of the Department of State, six thousand three hundred dollars.

For the like compensations to the Secretary and officers of the Department of War, nine thousand six hundred dollars.

For the like compensations to the members of the Board of Commissioners for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, including the clerks and attendants, thirteen thousand one hundred dollars.

For the like compensations to the Governors, Judges, and other officers of the Western Territory of the United States, including contingencies, eleven thousand dollars.

For the payment of the annual grant to Baron Steuben, pursuant to an act of Congress, two thousand five hundred dollars.

For the payment of sundry pensions granted by the late Government, two thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven dollars and seventy-three cents.

For defraying all other incidental and contingent expenses of the Civil List establishments, including firewood, stationery, together with the printing work, and all other contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, rent and office expenses of the three several Departments, namely Treasury, State, War, and of the General Board of Commissioners, twenty-one thousand five hundred and fifty-five dollars, and eighty-three cents.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation to the Doorkeepers of the two Houses, for services which have been heretofore rendered, or may be rendered in the recess of Congress for the year 1792, and certified by the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in manner required by law for like services during sessions, shall be discharged out of the money herein before appropriated for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for discharging certain liquidated claims upon the United States, for making good deficiencies in former appropriations, for the support of the Civil List estaishment, and for aiding the fund appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, and witnesses, and for the establishment of ten cutters, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding one hundred and ninety-seven thousand one hundred and nineteen dollars and forty-nine cents, that is to say:

For discharging a balance due on a liquidated claim of his Most Christian Majesty, against the United States, for supplies during the late war, nine thousand and twenty dollars and sixty-eight cents.

For payment of the principal and interest on a liquidated claim of Oliver Pollock, late Commercial Agent of the United States at New Orleans, during the late war, one hundred and eight thousand six hundred and five dollars and two cents: Provided, That the said moneys be not paid to the said Oliver Pollock without the consent of the agents of the Court of Spain.

For making good deficiencies in the last appropriations, for the compensation to sundry officers of the Civil List establishments, five thousand and four hundred and seventy-one dollars.

For defraying sundry authorized expenses to the Commissioners of Loans in the several States, twenty-one thousand dollars.

For defraying a balance of certain liquidated and contingent expenses in the Treasury Department, two thousand eight hundred dollars.

For defraying the additional expense of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, nineteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-two dollars and seventy-nine cents.

For making good a deficiency in former appropriations, to discharge the expenses to clerks, jurors, and witnesses, in the Courts of the United States, five thousand dollars.

For the maintenance and repair of light-houses, beacons, piers, stakes, and buoy, sixteen thousand dollars.

For the expense of keeping prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, four thousand dollars.

For the expense of clerks and books in arranging the public securities, two thousand four hundred and fifty dollars.

For the purchase of hydrometers for the use of the officers in the execution of the laws of revenue, one thousand dollars.

For the further expense of building and equipping ten cutters, two thousand dollars.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, the payment of the annual allowances to the invalid pensioners of the United States, for defraying all expenses incident to the Indian department, and for defraying the expenses incurred in the defensive protection of the frontiers against the Indians, during the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, by virtue of the authority vested in the President of the United States, by the acts relative to the Military Establishment, passed the twenty-ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and the thirtieth of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and for which no appropriations have been made, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding five hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and forty-nine dollars seventy-six cents and two thirds of a cent, that is to say:

For the pay of troops, - - - $102,686 00
For subsistence, - - - 119,688 97
For clothing, - - - 48,000 00
For forage, - - - 4,152 00
For the Hospital department, - - - 6,000 00
For the Quartermaster's department, - - - 50,000 00
For the Ordnance department, - - - 7,204 64
For the contingent expenses of the War Department, including maps, hire of express, allowances to officers for extra expenses, printing, loss of stores of all kinds, advertising, and apprehending deserters, - - - 20,000 00

For the discharge of certain sums due for pay and subsistence of sundry officers of the late Army, and for pay of the late Maryland line, for which no appropriations have been made, - - - 10,490 36

For the payment of the annual allowances to invalid pensioners, - - - 87,463 60
For defraying all expenses incidental to the Indian department, authorized by law, - - - 39,424 71

For defraying the expenses incurred in the defensive protection of the frontiers, as before recited, - - - 37,339 48

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit: First, out of the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, which, by the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," is reserved yearly for the support of the Government of the United States and their common defence; and secondly, out of such surplus as shall have accrued to the end of the present year, upon the revenues heretofore established, over and above the sums necessary for the payment of interest on the Public Debt during the same year, and for satisfying other prior appropriations.

Approved, December 23, 1791.

An Act for carrying into effect a Contract between the United States and the State of Pennsylvania.

For duly conveying to the State of Pennsylvania a certain tract of land, the right to the government and jurisdiction whereof was relinquished to the said State by a resolution of Congress of the fourth day of September, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, and whereof the right of soil has been sold by virtue of a previous resolution of Congress of the sixth day of June in the said year:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the Acts of Congress.

United States be authorized, in fulfilment of the terms stipulated on the part of the State of Pennsylvania, to issue letters patent, in the name and under the seal of the United States, granting and conveying to the said State forever, the said tract of land, as the same was ascertained by a survey made in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the sixth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

Approved, January 3, 1792.

An Act to extend the time limited for settling the Accounts of the United States with the individual States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the powers of the Board of Commissioners, which, by an act passed in the second session of the first Congress, was established to settle the accounts between the United States and individual States, shall continue until the first day of July, 1793, unless the business shall be sooner accomplished.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid act shall extend to the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Vermont; and that until the first day of December next, shall be allowed for the said State to exhibit its claims.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the pay of the principal clerk of the said Board shall be the same as the pay of the principal clerk in the Auditor's office.

Approved, January 23, 1792.

An Act concerning certain Fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the Fishermen employed therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That the allowance now made upon the exportation of dried fish, of the fisheries of the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duties paid on the salt used in preserving the same, shall cease on all dried fish exported after the tenth day of June next; and as a compensation and equivalent therefor, there shall be afterwards paid, on the last day of December annually, to the owner of every vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law for carrying on the Bank and other cod fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein, at sea, for the term of four months at the least of the fishing season next preceding, which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year, for each and every ton of such vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement as licensed or enrolled—if of twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, one and a half dollar; and if above thirty tons, two and a half dollars; of which allowance aforesaid, three-eighths parts shall accrue and belong to the owner of such fishing vessel, and the other five-eighths thereof shall be divided by him, his agent or lawful representative, to and among the several fishermen who shall have been employed in such vessel during the season aforesaid, or a part thereof, as the case may be, in such proportions as the fish they shall respectively have taken may bear to the whole quantity of fish taken on board such vessel during such season: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed one hundred and seventy dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That on the last day of December, annually, as aforesaid, there shall also be paid to the owner of every fishing boat or vessel of more than five tons, and less than twenty tons, or to his agent or lawful representative, by the collector of the district where such boat or vessel may belong, the sum of one dollar upon every ton admeasurement of such boat or vessel, which allowance shall be accounted for as part of the proceeds of the fare of said boat or vessel, and shall accordingly be so divided among all persons interested therein: Provided, however, That this allowance shall be made only to such boats or vessels as shall have actually been employed at sea in the cod fishery, for the term of four months at the least, of the preceding season: And provided, also, That such boat or vessel shall have landed, in the course of said preceding season, a quantity of fish not less than twelve quintals for every ton of her admeasurement; the said quantity of fish to be ascertained when dried and cured fit for exportation, and according to the weight thereof, as the same shall weigh at the time of delivery when actually sold; which account of the weight, with the original adjustment and settlement of the fare or fares among the owners and fishermen, together with a written account of the length, breadth, and depth of said boat or vessel, and the time she has actually been employed in the fishery in the preceding season, shall in all cases be produced and sworn or affirmed to, before the said collector of the district, in order to entitle the owner, his agent or lawful representative, to receive the allowance aforesaid. And if at any time within one year after payment of such allowance, it shall appear that any fraud or deceit has been practised in obtaining the same, the boat or vessel upon which such allowance shall have been paid, if found within the district aforesaid, shall be forfeited; otherwise the owner or owners, having practised such fraud or deceit, shall forfeit and pay one hundred dollars; to be sued for, recovered, and appropriated, in like manner as forfeitures and penalties are to be sued for, recovered and appropriated for any breach of an act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of every fishing vessel of twenty tons and upwards, his or their agent or lawful representative, shall, previous to receiving the allowance which is provided for in this act, produce to the collector who is authorized to pay the same, the original agreement or agreements which may have been made with the fishermen employed on board such vessel, as is herein before required, and also a certificate, to be by him or them subscribed, therein mentioning the particular days on which such vessel sailed and returned on the several voyages or fares she may have made, in the preceding fishing season; to the truth of which they shall swear or affirm, before the collector aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards, employed as aforesaid, shall be entitled to the allowance granted by this act, unless the skipper or master thereof shall, before he proceeds on any fishing voyage, make an agreement, in writing or in print, with every fisherman employed therein, excepting only an apprentice or servant of himself or owner; and in addition to such terms of shipment as may be agreed on, shall in such agreement express whether the same is to continue for one voyage or for the fishing season, and shall also express that the fish, or the proceeds of such fishing voyage or voyages, which may appertain to the fishermen, shall be divided among them, in proportion to the quantities or number of said fish they may respectively have caught; which agreement shall be endorsed or countersigned by the owner of such fishing vessel or his agent: And if any fisherman, having engaged himself for a voyage or for the fishing season, in any fishing vessel, and signed an agreement therefor as aforesaid, shall thereafter, and while such agreement remains in force and to be performed, desert or absent himself from such vessel, without leave of the master or skipper thereof, or of the owner or his agent, such deserter shall be liable to the same penalties as deserting seamen or mariners are subject to in the merchant service, and may in the like manner, and upon the like complaint and proof, be apprehended and detained; and all costs of process and commitment, if paid by the master or owner, shall be deducted out of the share of the fish or proceeds of any fishing voyage to which such deserter had or shall become entitled. And any fisherman, having engaged himself as aforesaid, who shall, during such fishing voyage, refuse or neglect his proper duty on board the fishing vessel, being thereto ordered or required by the master or skipper thereof, or shall otherwise resist his just commands, to the hindrance or detriment of such voyage, besides being answerable for such damages arising thereby, shall forfeit, to the use of the owner of such vessel, his share of the allowance which shall be paid upon such voyage, as is herein granted.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That where an agreement or contract shall be so made and signed, for a fishing voyage or for the fishing season, and any fish which may have been caught on board such vessel during the same shall be delivered to the owner or to his agent, for cure, and shall be sold by said owner or agent, such vessel shall, for the term of six months after such sale, be liable and answerable for the skipper's and every other fisherman's share of such fish, and may be proceeded against in the same form, and to the same effect, as any other vessel is by law liable and may be proceeded against, for the wages of seamen or mariners in the merchant service. And upon such process, for the value of a share or shares of the proceeds of fish delivered and sold as aforesaid, it shall be incumbent on the owner or his agent, to produce a just account of the sales and division of such fish, according to such agreement or contract, otherwise the said vessel shall be answerable upon such process for what may be the highest value of the share or shares demanded: But, in all cases, the owner of such vessel or his agent, appearing to answer to such process, may offer thereupon his account of general supplies made for such fishing voyage, and of other supplies therefor made, to either of the demandants, and shall be allowed to produce evidence thereof, in answer to the demands respectively, and judgment shall be rendered upon such process, for the respective balances which, upon such an inquiry, shall appear: Provided, always, That when process shall be issued against any vessel liable as aforesaid, if the owner thereof or his agent will give bond to each fisherman in whose favor such process shall be instituted, with sufficient security, to the satisfaction of two justices of the peace, one of whom shall be named by such owner or agent, and the other by the fisherman or fishermen pursuing such process; or if either party shall refuse, then the justice first appointed shall name his associate, with condition to answer and pay whatever sum shall be recovered by him or them on such process, there shall be an immediate discharge of such vessel: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent any fisherman from having his action at common law for his share or shares of fish, or the proceeds thereof, as aforesaid.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the drawback heretofore allowed on the exportation of foreign dried and pickled fish, and other foreign salted provisions, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the moneys which shall remain, in consequence of the abolition of the allowance on the exportation of the dried fish of the United States, and of the drawback on foreign dried and pickled fish, and other foreign salted provisions, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated to the payment of the allowances granted by this act; and in case the moneys so appropriated shall be inadequate, the deficiency shall be supplied out of any moneys which from time to time shall be in the Treasury in like manner, and not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall declare falsely in any oath or affirmation required by this act, being duly convicted thereof in any Court of the United States having jurisdiction of such offence, shall suffer the same penalties as are provided for false swearing or affirming, by the act before mentioned, and to be in like manner sued for, recovered, and appropriated.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of seven years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, February 16, 1792.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Postmaster General to enter into contracts, for a term not exceeding eight years, for extending the line of posts, and to authorize the person or persons, so contracting, to receive, during the continuance of such contract, according to the rates by this act established, all the postage which shall arise on letters, newspapers and packets, conveyed by any such post; and the roads, therein designated, shall, during the continuance of such contract, be deemed and considered as Post Roads, within the terms and provisions of this act: Provided, That no such contract shall be made, to the diminution of the revenue of the General Post Office, and that a duplicate of every such contract, under hand and seal, shall, within sixty days after the execution thereof, be lodged in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established, at the Seat of the Government of the United States, a General Post Office. And there shall be one Postmaster General, who shall have authority to appoint an Assistant, and Deputy Postmasters, at all the places where such shall be found necessary. And he shall provide for carrying the mail of the United States, by stage-carriages or horses, as he may judge most expedient; and as often as he, having regard to the promptness thereof, as well as other circumstances shall think proper, and defray the expense thereof, with all other expenses arising on the collection and management of the revenue of the Post Office. He shall also have power to prescribe such regulations to the Deputy Postmasters, and others employed under him, as may be found necessary, and to superintend the business of the Department, in all the duties that are, or may be assigned to it, and also to direct the route or road, where there are more than one, between the places above established, which route or road shall be considered as the Post Road.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall, once in three months, obtain from his deputies, the accounts and vouchers of their receipts and expenditures, and the balances due thereon, and render to the Secretary of the Treasury, a quarterly account of all the receipts and expenditures in the said Department, to be adjusted and settled, as other public accounts, and shall pay, quarterly, into the Treasury of the United States, the balance in his hands. And the Postmaster General, and his Assistant, the Deputy Postmasters, and such as they may employ in their offices, shall, respectively, before they enter upon the duties, or be entitled to receive the emoluments of their offices, and the contractors for carrying the mail, and their agents or servants, to whom the mail shall be intrusted, before they commence the execution, of said trust, shall respectively, take and subscribe before some Justice of the Peace, the following oath or affirmation, and cause a certificate thereof to be filed in the office of the Postmaster General: "I do swear (or affirm as the case may be) that I will faithfully perform all the duties required of me, and abstain from everything forbidden by the law in relation to the establishment of Post Offices and Post Roads within the United States."

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same, he shall, upon conviction for every such offence, pay a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars. And if any ferryman shall, by wilful negligence, or refusal to transport the mail across any ferry, delay the same, he shall forfeit, and pay, for each half hour that the same shall be so delayed, a sum not exceeding ten dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, to give public notice in one or more of the newspapers published at the Seat of Government of the United States, and in one or more of the newspapers published in the State or States where the contract is to be performed, for at least six weeks before the entering into any contract for the conveyance of the mail that such contract is to be intended to be made, and the day on which it shall be concluded; describing the places, from and to which such mail is to be conveyed; the time at which it is to be made up; the day and hour, at which it is to be delivered; and the penalty or penalties for non-performance of the stipulations. He shall, moreover, within thirty days after the making of any contract, lodge the same, together with the proposals which he shall have received respecting the same, in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That every Deputy Postmaster shall keep an office in which one or more persons shall attend at such hours as the Postmaster General shall direct, for the purpose of performing the duties thereof. And all letters brought to any Post Office, half an hour before the time of making up the mail at such office, shall be forwarded therein.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the Postmaster General shall be allowed, for his services, at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum, his Assistant at the rate of one thousand per annum, to be paid, quarterly, out of the revenues of the Post Office. And no fees or perquisites shall be received by either them, on account of the duties to be performed in virtue of their appointments.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 1st day of June next, the Deputy Postmaster and persons authorized by the Postmaster General, shall demand and receive, for the postage and conveyance of letters and packets, except such as are hereinafter excepted, according to the several rates and sums following: For the postage of every single letter, to or from any place by land not exceeding thirty miles, six cents; over thirty miles, and not exceeding sixty, eight cents; over sixty miles, and not exceeding one hundred, ten cents; over one hundred miles, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty, twelve cents and a-half; over one hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding two hundred, fifteen cents; over two hundred miles, and not exceeding two hundred and fifty, seventeen cents; over two hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding three hundred and fifty, twenty cents; over three hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding four hundred and fifty, twenty-two cents; and to or from any place by land, more than four hundred and fifty miles, twenty-five cents; and every double letter shall pay double the said rates; every triple letter, triple; every packet weighing one ounce avoirdupois, to pay, at the rate of four single letters for each ounce, and in that proportion, for any greater weight.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all letters and packets, passing by sea to and from the United States, or from one port to another therein, in packet boats or vessels, the property of, or provided by the United States, shall be rated and charged, as follows: For every single letter, eight cents; for every double letter, sixteen cents; for every triple letter or packet, twenty-four cents; for every letter or packet brought into the United States, or carried from one port therein to another by sea, in any private ship or vessel, four cents, if delivered at the place where the same shall arrive; and if directed to be delivered at any other place, with the addition of the like postage, as other letters are made subject to the payment of by this act.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That, if any Deputy Postmaster, or other person authorized by the Postmaster General, to receive the postages of letters, shall fraudulently demand or receive any rate of postage, or any gratuity or reward, other than is provided by this act for the postage of letters or packets, on conviction thereof, he shall forfeit for every such offence, one hundred dollars, and shall be rendered incapable of holding any office under the United States.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel, arriving at any port within the United States, where a Post Office is established, shall be permitted to report, make entry or break bulk, till the master or commander shall have delivered to the Postmaster, all letters directed to any person or persons within the United States, which, under his care or within his power, shall be brought in such ship or vessel, other than such as are directed to the owner or consignee; but when a vessel shall be bound to another port, than that at which she may enter, the letters belonging to, or to be delivered at the said port of delivery, shall not be delivered to the Postmaster at the port of entry. And it shall be the duty of the Collector or other officer of the port, empowered to receive entries of ships or vessels, to require from every master or commander of such ship or vessel, an oath or affirmation, purporting that he has delivered all such letters, except as aforesaid.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Postmasters to whom such letters may be delivered, shall pay to the master, commander, or other person delivering the same, except the commanders of foreign packets, two cents for every such letter or packet; and shall obtain from the person delivering the same, a certificate specifying the number of letters and packets, with the name of the ship or vessel, and the place from whence she last sailed; which certificate, together with a receipt for the money, shall be with his half-yearly accounts, transmitted to the Postmaster General, who shall credit the amount thereof to the Postmaster forwarding the same.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That, if any person, other than the Postmaster General, or his deputies, or persons by them employed, shall take up, receive, order, despatch, convey, carry or deliver any letter or letters, packet or packets, other than newspapers, for hire or reward, or shall be concerned in setting up any foot or horse post, wagon or other carriage, by or in which any letter or packet shall be carried for hire, on any established Post Road, or any packet, or other vessel or boat, or any conveyance whatever, whereby the revenue of the General Post Office may be injured, every person, so offending, shall forfeit, for every such offence, the sum of two hundred dollars: Provided, That it shall and may be lawful for every person to send letters or packets by special messenger.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters or agents of the Postmaster General, shall duly account and answer to him, for all by or way letters, and shall specify the number and rates in the Post Bill. And if any Deputy Postmaster or agent shall neglect so to account, he or they so offending, shall on conviction thereof, forfeit, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That, if any person, employed in any of the Departments of the General Post Office, shall unlawfully detain, delay, or open any letter, packet, bag or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post; or if any such person shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter or packet, intrusted to him, as aforesaid, and which shall not contain any security for, or assurance relating to money, as hereinafter described, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offence, be fined not exceeding three hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offence. And if any person, employed as aforesaid, shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note, or bank post bill, bill of exchange, warrant of the Treasury of the United States, note of assignment of stock in the funds, letters of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, or for selling stock in the funds, or for receiving the interest thereof, or any letter of credit, or note for, or relating to the payment of money, or other bond or warrant, draft, bill, or promissory note whatsoever, for the payment of money; or if any such person, employed as aforesaid, shall steal or take any of the same out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, that shall come to his possession, he shall, on conviction, for any such offence, suffer death. And if any person, who shall have taken charge of the mail of the United States, shall quit or desert the same, before his arrival at the next Post Office, every such person, so offending, shall forfeit and pay a sum, not exceeding five hundred dollars, for every such offence. And if any person, concerned in carrying the mail of the United States, shall collect, receive or carry any letter or packet, or shall cause or procure the same to be done, contrary to this act, every such offender shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall rob any carrier of the mail of the United States, of such mail, or if any person shall rob the mail, in which letters are sent to be conveyed by post, of any letter or packet, or shall steal such mail, or shall steal and take from or out of the same, or from or out of any Post Office, any letter or packet, such offender or offenders shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters shall, respectively, publish at the expiration of every three months, in one of the newspapers published at, or nearest the place of his residence, for three successive weeks, a list of all the letters then remaining in their respective offices; and at the expiration of the next three months, shall send such of the said letters as then remain on hand, as dead letters, to the General Post Office, where the same shall be opened and inspected; and if any valuable papers or matter of consequence, shall be found therein, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, to cause a descriptive list thereof to be inserted in one of the newspapers, published at the place most convenient to where the owner may be supposed to reside, if within the United States, and such letter and the contents shall be preserved, to be delivered to the person, to whom the same shall be addressed, upon payment of the postage, and the expense of publication.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the following letters and packets, and no other, shall be received and conveyed by post, free of postage, under such restrictions as are hereinafter provided; that is to say, all letters and packets to or from the President or Vice President of the United States, and all letters and packets, not exceeding two ounces in weight, to or from any member of the Senate or House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives, during their actual attendance in any session of Congress, and twenty days after such session. All letters to and from the Secretary of the Treasury, and his Assistant, Comptroller, Register, and Auditor of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, the Postmaster General and his Assistant: Provided, That no person shall frank or enclose any letter or packet, other than his own; but any public letter or packet from the Department of the Treasury may be franked by the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Assistant Secretary, or by the Comptroller, Register, Auditor or Treasurer. And that each person before named shall deliver to the Post Office every letter or packet enclosed to him, which may be directed to any other person, noting the place, from whence it came by post, and the usual postage shall be charged thereon.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall counterfeit the handwriting of any other person, in order to evade the payment of postage, such person or persons so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, the sum of one hundred dollars.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That every printer of newspapers may send one paper to each and every other printer of newspapers within the United States, free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall provide.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That all newspapers conveyed in the mail shall be under a cover open at one end, carried in separate bags from the letters, and charged with the payment of one cent for any distance not more than one hundred miles, and one cent and a half for any greater distance. And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General and his Deputy to keep a separate account for the newspapers, and the Deputy Postmasters shall receive fifty per cent. on the postage of all newspapers; and if any other matter or thing be enclosed in such papers, the whole packet shall be charged, agreeably to the rates established by this act, for letters or packets,

And if any of the persons employed in any department of the Post Office shall unlawfully detain, delay, embezzle, or destroy any newspaper with which he shall be intrusted, such offenders, for every such offence, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars: Provided, That the Postmaster General, in any contract he may enter into for the conveyance of the mail, may authorize the person with whom such contract is made to carry newspapers other than those conveyed in the mail.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to the Deputy Postmasters, respectively, such commission on the moneys arising from the postage of letters and packets as he shall think adequate to their respective services: Provided, That the said commission shall not exceed forty per cent. to any Deputy whose compensation thereby shall not exceed fifty dollars, nor thirty per cent. to any Deputy whose compensation thereby shall not exceed one hundred dollars, nor twenty per cent. to any other Deputy, except the Postmaster at the port where the European packets do or shall steadily arrive, to whom such further allowance, in addition to the emoluments of his office, shall be made as the Postmaster General shall deem a reasonable compensation for his extra services in the receipt and despatch of letters originally received into his office from on board such packets, and by him forwarded to other offices: And provided, also, That the commissions aforesaid shall not exceed eighteen hundred dollars per annum to any one Postmaster for all services by him rendered.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That, if any Deputy Postmaster or other person authorized to receive the postage of letters and packets, shall neglect or refuse to render his accounts and pay over to the Postmaster General the balance by him due, at the end of every three months, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause a suit to be commenced against the person or persons so neglecting or refusing; and if the Postmaster General shall not cause such suit to be commenced within three months from the end of every such three months, the balances due from every such delinquent shall be charged to, and recoverable from, the Postmaster General.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That all pecuniary penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act shall be, one-half for the use of the person or persons informing and prosecuting for the same, the other half to the use of the United States.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to make provision, where it may be necessary, for the receipt of all letters and packets intended to be conveyed by any ship or vessel beyond sea, or from any port of the United States to another port therein; and the letters so received shall be formed into a mail, sealed up, and directed to the Postmaster of the port to which such ship or vessel shall be bound. And for every letter or packet so received there shall be paid, at the time of its reception, a postage of one cent; and the Postmaster General may make arrangements with the Postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets through the Post Offices.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters, and the persons employed in the transportation of the mail, shall be exempt from militia duties, or any fine or penalty for neglect thereof.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That all the surplus revenue of the General Post Office which shall have accrued previous to the first day of June next, not heretofore appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any deficiency which may arise in the revenue of the said Department for the year next ensuing.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That the act passed at the last session of Congress entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, an act entitled 'An act for the temporary establishment of the Post Office,' be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force until the first day of June next, and no longer.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for the term of two years, from the said first day of June next, and no longer. Approved, February 20, 1792.

An Act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President.

Be it enacted, &c., That, except in case of an election of a President and Vice President of the United States, prior to the ordinary period, as hereinafter specified, Electors shall be appointed in each State for the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in every fourth year succeeding the last election, every Elector shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives, to which the several States may by law be entitled at the time, when the President and Vice President, thus to be chosen, should come into office: Provided, always, That where no apportionment of Representatives shall have been made after any enumeration, at the time of choosing Electors, then the number of Electors shall be according to the existing apportionment of Senators and Representatives.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, at such place in each State as shall be directed by the Legislature thereof; and the Electors in each State shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes by them given, and shall seal up the same, certifying on each that a list of the votes of such State for President and Vice President is contained therein, and shall by writing under their hands, or under the hands of a majority of them, appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate, at the Seat of Government, before the first Wednesday in January then next ensuing, one of the said certificates; and the said Electors shall forthwith forward, by the Post Office, to the President of the Senate, at the Seat of Government, one other of the said certificates; and shall forthwith cause the other of the said certificates to be delivered to the Judge of that District in which the said Electors shall assemble.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the Electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered to the Electors on or before the said first Wednesday in December; and the said Electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if a list of votes from any State shall not have been received at the Seat of Government on the said first Wednesday in January, that then the Secretary of State shall send a special messenger to the District Judge in whose custody such list shall have been lodged, who shall forthwith transmit the same to the Seat of Government.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the Electors, and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in case there shall be no President of the Senate at the Seat of Government on the arrival of the persons intrusted with the lists of the votes of the Electors, then such persons shall deliver the lists of votes in their custody into the office of the Secretary of State, to be safely kept, and delivered over as soon as may be to the President of the Senate.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the persons appointed by the Electors to deliver the lists of votes to the President of the Senate, shall be allowed, on the delivery of the said lists, twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from the place of meeting of the Electors to the Seat of the Government of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, if any person appointed to deliver the votes of the Electors to the President of the Senate, shall, after accepting of his appointment, neglect to perform the services required of him by this act, he shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that the Electors of the President of the United States shall be appointed or chosen in the several States within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December then next ensuing: Provided, There shall be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December; but if there shall not be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the first Wednesday in December, and if the term for which the President and Vice President last in office were elected shall not expire on the third day of March next ensuing, then the Secretary of State shall specify in the notification that the Electors shall be appointed or chosen within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in the year next ensuing, within which time the Electors shall accordingly be appointed or chosen; and the Electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, and the proceedings and duties of the said Electors and others shall be pursuant to the directions prescribed in this act.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the only evidence of a refusal to accept, or of a resignation of the office of President or Vice President shall be an instrument in writing declaring the same, and subscribed by the person refusing to accept, or resigning, as the case may be, and delivered into the office of the Secretary of State.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the term of four years, for which a President and Vice President shall be elected, shall, in all cases, commence on the fourth day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the Electors shall have been given.

Approved, March 1, 1792.

An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the Frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the battalion of artillery now in service be completed according to the establishment, and that the two regiments of infantry now in service be completed to the number of nine hundred and sixty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, each.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised for a term not exceeding three years, three additional regiments, each of which exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of nine hundred and sixty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and that one of the said regiments be organized in the following manner: that is to say—two battalions of infantry, each of which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of three hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and one squadron of light dragoons, which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of three hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and that it shall be a condition in the enlistment of the said dragoons, to serve as dismounted dragoons, whenever they shall be ordered thereto: That the organization of the said squadron of light dragoons shall be as follows, to wit: One major, one adjutant, one quartermaster, one surgeon's mate, and four troops, each of which shall consist of one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, four sergeants, four corporals, one farrier, one saddler, one trumpeter, and sixty-nine dragoons; and the President may arm the said troops as he shall think proper. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to organize the said five regiments of infantry and the said corps of horse and artillery as he shall judge expedient, diminishing the number of corps, or taking from one corps and adding to another, as shall appear to him proper; so that the whole number of officers and men shall not exceed the limits above prescribed: Provided, That the said three regiments shall be discharged as soon as the United States shall be at peace with the Indian tribes.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians of the said three regiments shall be enlisted for the term of three years, unless previously discharged.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every recruit, who shall be enlisted by virtue of this act, shall receive eight dollars bounty, and that the same shall be made up to the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians now in service, who have enlisted for three years, since the passing of the act entitled "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States."

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers, who shall be employed to recruit for the military establishment, shall be entitled to receive, for every recruit, duly enlisted and mustered, two dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the monthly pay of the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, on the military establishment of the United States, and of the three regiments authorized by this act, shall be, in future, as follows, free of all deductions, to wit:

GENERAL STAFF.—A major general, one hundred and sixty-six dollars; a brigadier general, one hundred and four dollars; quartermaster, one hundred dollars; adjutant, to do also the duty of inspector, seventy-five dollars; chaplain, fifty dollars; surgeon, seventy dollars; deputy quartermaster, fifty dollars; aid-de-camp, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; brigade major, to act also as deputy inspector, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; principal artificer, forty dollars; second artificer, twenty-six dollars.

REGIMENTAL.—Lieutenant colonel commandant, seventy-five dollars; major commandant of artillery and major of dragoons, fifty-five dollars; paymaster, in addition to his pay in the line, ten dollars; quartermaster, in addition to his pay in the line, eight dollars; adjutant, in addition to his pay in the line, ten dollars; majors of infantry, fifty dollars; captains, forty dollars; lieutenants, twenty-six dollars; ensigns and cornets, twenty dollars; surgeons, forty-five dollars; mates, thirty dollars; sergeant major and quartermaster sergeants, seven dollars; senior musicians, six dollars; corporals, five dollars; privates three dollars; musicians, four dollars; artificers allowed to the infantry, light dragoons, and artillery, and included as privates, eight dollars; matrons and nurses in the hospital, eight dollars.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the rations, or money in lieu thereof, for the commissioned, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the additional troops herein mentioned, shall be the same as described in the aforesaid act, entitled, "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States," and in the act passed in the third session of the first Congress, entitled "An act for raising and adding another regiment to the military establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers."

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the forage to be allowed to the officers of the additional regiments authorized by this act, be the same as described by the acts before mentioned.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the allowance of clothing for non-commissioned officers and privates of the infantry of the said three regiments, shall be the same as is by law established: that suitable clothing be provided for the cavalry, and adapted to the nature of the service, and conformed as near as may be to the value of the clothing allowed to the infantry and artillery.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the said three regiments, shall take the same oaths, shall be governed by the same rules and regulations, and, in cases of disabilities, shall receive the same compensations, as are described in the before mentioned act, entitled "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States."

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to forbear to raise, or to discharge after they shall be raised, the whole or any part of the said three additional regiments, in case events shall, in his judgment, render his so doing consistent with the public safety.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is authorized, from time to time, to call into service, and for such periods as he may deem requisite, such number of cavalry as, in his judgment, may be necessary for the protection of the frontiers: Provided, That non-commissioned officers shall not be allowed more than one dollar per day, nor the privates more than seventy-five cents per day; each person finding his horse, arms, and accoutrements, and at his own risk; and twenty-five cents per day in lieu of rations and forage, provided he furnish himself therewith.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President alone be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint, for the cavalry so to be engaged, the proper commissioned officers, who shall not exceed, in number and rank, the proportions assigned to the said three regiments, and whose pay and other allowances shall not, exclusively of fifty cents per day for the use and risk of their horses, exceed those of officers of corresponding rank in the said regiments.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized, in case he shall deem the measure expedient, to employ such number of the Indiana, and for such compensations, as he may think proper: Provided, The said compensations do not, in the whole, exceed twenty thousand dollars.

Approved, March 5, 1792.

An Act declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland, and to continue for a longer time an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

Be it enacted, &c., That the consent of Congress be, and is hereby, granted and declared to the operation of an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, made and passed at a session begun and held at the city of Annapolis, on the first Monday in November last, entitled "An act empowering the wardens of the port of Baltimore to levy and collect the duty therein mentioned."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," shall be continued, and is hereby declared to be in full force, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force for the term of three years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 19, 1792.

An Act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.

Be it enacted, &c., That the operation of the resolutions of the late Congress of the United States, passed on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, so far as they have barred, or may be construed to bar, the claims of the widow or orphans of any officer of the late Army, to the seven years half-pay of such officer, shall, from and after the passing this act, be suspended for and during the term of two years.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any commissioned officer, not having received the commutation of half-pay, and any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, by wounds or other known cause, who did not desert from the said service, shall be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States during life or the continuance of such disability, and shall also be allowed such further sum for the arrears of pension, from the time of such disability, not exceeding the rate of the annual allowance, in consequence of his disability, as the Circuit Court of the district in which they respectively reside may think just: Provided, That in every such case the rules and regulations following shall be complied with; that is to say, first, every applicant shall attend the Court in person, except where it shall be certified by two magistrates that he is unable to do so, and shall produce to the Circuit Court the following proofs, to wit: a certificate from the commanding officer of the ship, regiment, corps, or company in which he served, setting forth his disability, and that he was thus disabled while in the service of the United States; or the affidavits of two credible witnesses to same effect; the affidavits of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county in which he resides, ascertaining of their own knowledge the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support of such applicant, for the last twelve months. Secondly, the Circuit Court, upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine into the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their inquiry, in case in their opinion the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the Secretary of War, together with their opinion in writing, what proportion of the monthly pay of such applicant will be equivalent to the degree of disability ascertained in manner aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the District Court, in each district, shall publish this act in such manner as the Judge of the District Court shall think effectual to give general information thereof to the people of the district, and shall give like information of the times and places of holding the Circuit Courts in such district. And in districts wherein a Circuit Court is not directed by law to be holden, the Judge of the District Court shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to exercise all the powers given by this act to the respective Circuit Courts. And it shall be the duty of the Judges of the Circuit Courts, respectively, during the term of two years from the passing of this act, to remain at the places where the said Courts shall be holden five days at the least, from the time of opening the sessions thereof, that persons disabled as aforesaid may have full opportunity to make their application for the relief proposed by this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, upon receipt of the proofs, certificate, and opinion aforesaid, shall cause the same to be duly filed in his office, and place the name of such applicant on the pension list of the United States, in conformity thereto: Provided, always, That, in any case where the said Secretary shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, he shall have power to withhold the name of such applicant from the pension list, and make report of the same to Congress at their next session.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers, soldiers, and seamen, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, whose disability and rate of allowance have been ascertained, pursuant to the regulations prescribed by the late Congress, and have not applied to be placed on the pension list until after the time limited by the act of Congress for that purpose was expired, shall now be placed on the pension list, and be entitled to demand and receive their respective pensions, according to the allowances ascertained as aforesaid, any thing in this act, or any act of the late Congress, to the contrary, notwithstanding.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no sale, transfer, or mortgage of the whole, or any part of the pension or arrears of pension, payable to any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, before the same shall become due, shall be valid. And every person claiming such pension or arrears of pension, or any part thereof, under power of attorney or substitution, shall, before the same is paid, make oath or affirmation before some Justice of the Peace of the place where the same is payable, that such power or substitution is not given by reason of any transfer of such pension, or arrears of pension, and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be thereof convicted, shall suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

Approved, March 23, 1792.

An Act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established.

Be it enacted, &c., That the operation of the resolutions of the late Congress of the United States, passed on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, so far as they have barred, or may be construed to bar, the claims of any officer, soldier, artificer, sailor, or marine, of the late Army or Navy of the United States, for personal services rendered to the United States, in the Military or Naval Department, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be suspended for and during the term of two years. And that every such claim for services rendered to the United States in the Military or Naval Departments, who shall exhibit the same for liquidation at the Treasury of the United States, at any time during the said term of two years, shall be entitled to an adjustment and allowance thereof on the same principles, as if the same had been exhibited within the term prescribed by the aforesaid resolutions of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend to claims for rations or subsistence money.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no balances hereafter to be certified as due from the United States, shall be registered in any other name than that of the original claimant, or of his heirs, executors, or administrators; and such balances shall be transferable only at the Treasury, by virtue of powers actually executed after such registry, expressing the sum to be transferred, and in pursuance of such general rules as have been, or shall be prescribed for that purpose.

Approved, March 27, 1792.

An Act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Comptroller of the Treasury adjust the claims of the widows and orphans, respectively, as the case may be, of the late Colonel Owen Roberts, Captain William White, Lieutenant Colonel Bernard Elliott, Major Samuel Wise, Major Benjamin Huger, Lieutenant John Bush, and Major Charles Motte, deceased, all of whom were killed or died in the service of the United States, for the seven years' half-pay stipulated by the resolve of Congress of the twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty; and that the Register of the Treasury do issue his certificates accordingly.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Department of War be, and he hereby is, required to place on the Invalid List, Timothy Mix, disabled in the late war, by the loss of his right hand, while in the service of the United States, at the rate of five dollars per month, to commence on the fourth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three; that the said Secretary place on the Invalid List, Abel Turney, mariner, disabled while in the service of the United States, at the rate of one dollar per month, to commence on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the arrears of the said pensions be paid as the laws direct in similar cases.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to adjust the accounts of Joseph Pannil, a Lieutenant Colonel in the service of the United States, as a deranged officer upon the principles of the act of the late Congress of the third of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, and to allow him the usual commutation of the half-pay for life of a Lieutenant Colonel; and that the Register of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to grant a certificate for the amount of the balance due to him; that the Comptroller adjust the account of the late Brigadier General De Haas, admitting to the credit of the said account such sums as, by evidence, shall appear to have been advanced for the public service, and which have been charged by the United States to the officers who have received the same for the public ser-vise; and that the said Register do grant a certificate for the balance due on such settlement; that the said Comptroller adjust the account of Thomas McIntire, a Captain in the service of the United States during the late war, and allow him the usual commutation of the half-pay for life of a Captain, and that the said Register grant a certificate for the amount thereof accordingly.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to adjust the account of Francis Suzor Debevere, a surgeon's mate in the service of the United States during the late war, and who remained in captivity to the end thereof, and that the Register of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to grant a certificate for the amount which shall be found due for the services of the said Francis Suzor Debevere; that the said Comptroller adjust the account of Robert King, as a Lieutenant, deranged upon the principles of the act of the late Congress, passed the twenty-fourth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and that the said Register grant a certificate accordingly; that the Comptroller adjust the account of Lemuel Sherman, as a sailing-master of a galley on Lake Champlain, and as such taken prisoner; and that the said Register grant a certificate accordingly.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be granted to Nicholas Ferdinand Westfall, who left the British service, and joined the Army of the United States during the late war, one hundred acres of unappropriated land in the Western Territory of the United States, free of all charges, and also the sum of three hundred and thirty-six dollars, out of any money appropriated to the contingent charges of Government.

Approved, March 27, 1792.

An Act supplemental to the Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint such number of Brigadier Generals as may be conducive to the good of the public service: Provided, The whole number appointed, or to be appointed, shall not exceed four.

Approved, March 28, 1792.

An Act for finishing the Light-house on Bald Head, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, be authorized, as soon as may be, to cause to be finished, in such manner as shall appear advisable, the light-house heretofore begun under the authority of the State of North Carolina, on Bald Head, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the said State; and that a sum, not exceeding four thousand dollars, be appropriated for the same, out of any moneys heretofore appropriated, which may remain unexpended, after satisfying the purposes for which they were appropriated, or out of any other moneys which may be in the Treasury, not subject to any prior appropriation.

Approved, April 2, 1792.

An Act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That a Mint, for the purpose of national coinage, be, and the same is established, to be situate and carried on at the Seat of the Government of the United States for the time being; and that for the well conducting of the business of the said Mint, there shall be the following officers and persons, namely: a Director, an Assayer, a Chief Coiner, an Engraver, a Treasurer.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Director of the Mint shall employ as many clerks, workmen, and servants as he shall from time to time find necessary, subject to the approbation of the President of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the respective functions and duties of the officers above mentioned shall be as follows: The Director of the Mint shall have the chief management of the business thereof, and shall superintend all other officers and persons who shall be employed therein. The Assayer shall receive and give receipts for all metals which may lawfully be brought to the Mint to be coined; and shall assay all such of them as may require it, and shall deliver them to the Chief Coiner, to be coined. The Chief Coiner shall cause to be coined all metals which shall be received by him for that purpose, according to such regulations as shall be prescribed by this or any future law. The Engraver shall sink and prepare the necessary dies for such coinage, with the proper devices and inscriptions; but it shall be lawful for the functions and duties of Chief Coiner and Engraver to be performed by one person. The Treasurer shall receive from the Chief Coiner all the coins which shall have been struck, and shall pay or deliver them to the persons respectively to whom the same ought to be paid or delivered; he shall, moreover, receive and safely keep all moneys which shall be for the use, maintenance, and support of the Mint, and shall disburse the same upon warrants signed by the Director.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every officer and clerk of the said Mint shall, before he enters upon the execution of his office, take an oath or affirmation, before some Judge of the United States, faithfully and diligently to perform the duties thereof.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said Assayer, Chief Coiner, and Treasurer, previously to entering upon the execution of their respective offices, shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of ten thousand dollars, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of his office.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there:

shall be allowed and paid, as compensations for their respective services: To the said Director, a yearly salary of two thousand dollars; to the said Assayer, a yearly salary of one thousand five hundred dollars; to the said Chief Coiner, a yearly salary of one thousand five hundred dollars; to the said Engraver, a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars; to the said Treasurer, a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars; and to each clerk who may be employed, a yearly salary not exceeding five hundred dollars; and to the several subordinate workmen and servants, such wages and allowances as are customary and reasonable, according to their respective stations and occupations.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the accounts of the officers and persons employed in and about the said Mint, and for services performed in relation thereto, and all other accounts concerning the business and administration thereof, shall be adjusted and settled in the Treasury Department of the United States; and a quarter-yearly account of the receipts and disbursements of the said Mint, shall be rendered at the said Treasury for settlement, according to such forms and regulations as shall have been prescribed by that Department; and that once in each year a report of the transactions of the said Mint, accompanied by an abstract of the settlements which shall have been from time to time made, duly certified by the Comptroller of the Treasury, shall be laid before Congress for their information.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the authority vested in the President of the United States, by a resolution of the last session, touching the engaging of artists and the procuring of apparatus for the said Mint, the President be authorized, and he is hereby authorized, to cause to be provided and put in proper condition such buildings, and in such manner, as shall appear to him requisite for the purpose of carrying on the business of the said Mint; and that as well the expenses which shall have been incurred pursuant to the said resolution, as those which may be incurred in providing and preparing the said buildings, and all other expenses which may hereafter accrue for the maintenance and support of the said Mint, and in carrying on the business thereof, over and above the sums which may be received by reason of the rate per centum for coinage hereinafter mentioned, shall be defrayed from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys which from time to time shall be therein, not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That there shall be from time to time struck and coined, at the said Mint, coins of gold, silver, and copper, of the following denominations, values, and descriptions, viz: Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units, and to contain two hundred and forty-seven grains and four eighths of a grain of pure, or two hundred and seventy grains of standard gold; Half Eagles, each to be of the value of five dollars, and to contain one hundred and twenty-three grains and six eighths of a grain of pure, or one hundred and thirty-five grains of standard gold; Quarter Eagles, each to be of the value of two dollars and a half dollar, and to contain sixty-one grains and seven eighths of a grain of pure, or sixty-seven grains and four eighths of a grain of standard gold; Dollars or Units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver; Half Dollars, each to be of half the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain one hundred and eighty-five grains and ten sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or two hundred and eight grains of standard silver; Quarter Dollars, each to be of one fourth the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain ninety-two grains and thirteen sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or one hundred and four grains of standard silver; Dimes, each to be of the value of one tenth of a dollar or unit, and to contain thirty-seven grains and two sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or forty-one grains and three fifth parts of a grain of standard silver; Half Dimes, each to be of the value of one twentieth of a dollar, and to contain eighteen grains and nine sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or twenty grains and four fifth parts of a grain of standard silver; Cents, each to be of the value of the one hundredth part of a dollar, and to contain eleven pennyweights of copper; Half Cents, each to be of the value of half a cent, and to contain five pennyweights and half a pennyweight of copper.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That upon the said coins respectively there shall be the following devices and legends, namely: Upon one side of each of the said coins there shall be an impression emblematic of Liberty, with an inscription of the word Liberty, and the year of the coinage; and upon the reverse of each of the gold and silver coins there shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with this inscription, "United States of America;" and upon the reverse of each of the copper coins, there shall be an inscription which shall express the denomination of the piece, namely, cent or half cent, as the case may require.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the proportional value of gold to silver, in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States, shall be as fifteen to one, according to quantity in weight, of pure gold or pure silver; that is to say, every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with one pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the standard for all gold coins of the United States, shall be eleven parts fine, to one part alloy; and, accordingly, that eleven parts in twelve of the entire weight of each of the said coins shall consist of pure gold, and the remaining one twelfth part of alloy; and the said alloy shall be composed of silver and copper, in such proportions, not exceeding one half silver, as shall be found convenient, to be regulated by the Director of the Mint for the time being, with the approbation of the President of the United States, until further provision shall be made by law. And to the end that the necessary information may be had in order to the making of such further provision, it shall be the duty of the Director of the Mint, at the expiration of a year, after commencing the operations of the said Mint, to report to Congress the practice thereof during the said year, touching the composition of the alloy of the said gold coins, the reasons for such practice, and the experiments and observations which shall have been made concerning the effects of different proportions of silver and copper in the said alloy.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the standard for all silver coins of the United States, shall be one thousand four hundred and eighty-five parts fine, to one hundred and seventy-nine parts alloy; and accordingly, that one thousand four hundred and eighty-five parts in one thousand six hundred and sixty-four parts of the entire weight of each of the said coins, shall consist of pure silver, and the remaining one hundred and seventy-nine parts of alloy, which alloy shall be wholly of copper.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person or persons to bring to the said Mint gold and silver bullion, in order to their being coined; and that the bullion so brought shall be there assayed and coined as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and that free of expense to the person or persons by whom the said bullion have been brought. And as soon as the persons by whom the same shall have been delivered shall, upon demand, receive in lieu thereof coins of the same species of bullion which shall have been so delivered, weight for weight, of the pure gold or pure silver therein contained: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be at the mutual option of the party or parties bringing such bullion, and of the Director of the said Mint, to make an immediate exchange of coins for standard bullion, with a deduction of one half per cent. from the weight of the pure gold or pure silver contained in the said bullion, as an indemnification to the Mint for the time which will necessarily be required for coining the said bullion, and for the advance which shall have been so made in coins. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the said Mint from time to time, whenever the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, with such sums as may be necessary for effecting the said exchanges, to be replaced as speedily as may be, out of the coins which shall have been made of the bullion for which the moneys so furnished shall have been exchanged; and the said deduction of one half per cent. shall constitute a fund towards defraying the expenses of the said Mint.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the bullion which shall be brought as aforesaid to the Mint to be coined, shall be coined, and the equivalent thereof in coins rendered, if demanded, in the order in which the said bullion shall have been brought or delivered, giving priority according to priority of delivery only, and without preference to any person or persons; and if any preference shall be given, contrary to the direction aforesaid, the officer by whom such undue preference shall be given shall in each case forfeit and pay one thousand dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit. And to the end that it may be known if such preference shall at any time be given, the Assayer or officer to whom the said bullion shall be delivered to be coined, shall give to the person or persons bringing the same, a memorandum in writing, under his hand, denoting the weight, fineness, and value thereof, together with the day and order of its delivery into the Mint.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at, and issued from the said Mint, shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever; those of full weight according to the respective values herein before declared, and those of less than full weight at values proportional to their respective weights.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the respective officers of the said Mint, carefully and faithfully to use their best endeavors that all the gold and silver coins which shall be struck at the said Mint shall be, as nearly as may be, conformable to the several standards and weights aforesaid, and that the copper whereof the cents and half cents aforesaid may be composed, shall be of good quality.

Sec. 18. And the better to secure a due conformity of the said gold and silver coins to their respective standards, Be it further enacted, That from every separate mass of standard gold or silver, which shall be made into coins at the said Mint, there shall be taken, set apart by the Treasurer, and reserved in his custody, a certain number of pieces, not less than three; and that once in every year the pieces so set apart and reserved shall be assayed, under the inspection of the Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary and Comptroller of the Treasury, the Secretary for the Department of State, and the Attorney General of the United States, (who are hereby required to attend for that purpose at the said Mint, on the last Monday in July in each year,) or under the inspection of any three of them, in such manner as they or a majority of them shall direct, and in the presence of the Director, Assayer, and Chief Coiner of the said Mint; and if it shall be found that the gold and silver so assayed shall not be inferior to their respective standards herein before declared more than one part in one hundred and forty-four parts, the officer or officers of the said Mint whom it may concern shall be held excusable, but if any greater inferiority shall appear, it shall be certified to the President of the United States, and the said officer or officers shall be deemed disqualified to hold their respective offices.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That if any of the gold or silver coins which shall be struck or coined at the said Mint, shall be debased or made worse, as to the proportion of fine gold or fine silver therein contained, or shall be of less weight or value than the same ought to be, pursuant to the directions of this act, through the default or with the connivance of any of the officers or persons who shall be employed at the said Mint, for the purpose of profit or gain, or otherwise with a fraudulent intent, and if any of the said officers or persons shall embezzle any of the metals which shall at any time be committed to their charge for the purpose of being coined, or any of the coins which shall be struck or coined at the said Mint, every such officer or person who shall commit any or either of the said offences, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall suffer death.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That the money of account of the United States shall be expressed in dollars or units, dimes or tenths, cents or hundredths, and mills or thousandths; a dime being the tenth part of a dollar, a cent the hundredth part of a dollar, a mill the thousandth part of a dollar; and that all accounts in the public offices, and all proceedings in the Courts of the United States shall be kept and had in conformity to this regulation.

Approved, April 2, 1792.

An Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers.

Be it enacted, &c., That all expenses which shall accrue from the first day of July next, inclusively, for the necessary support, maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, the stakeage of channels on the sea-coast, and public piers, shall continue to be defrayed by the United States, until the first day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, notwithstanding such light-houses, beacons, or public piers, with the lands and tenements thereunto belonging, and the jurisdiction of the same, shall not in the mean time be ceded to or vested in the United States by the State or States respectively in which the same may be, and that the said time be further allowed to the States respectively to make such session.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to cause to be provided, erected, and placed, a floating beacon, and as many buoys as may be necessary for the security of navigation, at and near the entrance of the harbor of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina; and also, to have affixed three floating beacons in the Bay of Chesapeake—one at the north end of Willoughby's Spit, another at the tail of the Horse Shoe, and the third on the shoal-est place of the Middle Ground.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act to erect a light-house on Montauk Point, in the State of New York.

Be it enacted, &c., That, as soon as the jurisdiction of such land on Montauk Point, in the State of New York, as the President of the United States shall deem sufficient and most proper for the convenience and accommodation of a light-house, shall have been ceded to the United States, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide, by contract, which shall be approved by the Acts of Congress.

President of the United States, for building a light-house thereon, and for furnishing the same with all necessary supplies, and also to agree for the salaries or wages of the person or persons who may be appointed by the President for the superintendence and care of the same; and the President is hereby authorized to make the said appointments; that the number and disposition of the lights in said light-house shall be such as may tend to distinguish it from others, and, as far as is practicable, prevent mistakes.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, at the request of John Cleves Symmes, or his agent or agents, to alter the contract made between the late Board of Treasury and the said John Cleves Symmes for the sale of a tract of land of one million of acres, in such manner that the said tract may extend from the mouth of the Great Miami to the mouth of the Little Miami, and be bounded by the river Ohio on the south, by the Great Miami on the west, by the Little Miami on the east, and by a parallel of latitude on the north, extending from the Great Miami to the Little Miami, so as to comprehend the proposed quantity of one million of acres: Provided, That the northern limits of the said tract shall not interfere with the boundary-line established by the treaty of Fort Harmar, between the United States and the Indian nations: And provided, also, That the President reserve to the United States such lands at and near Fort Washington as he may think necessary for the accommodation of a garrison at that fort.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the termination of the present session of Congress, the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives shall each be allowed a salary of five hundred dollars per annum, in full compensation for their services in the said offices; and that the Assistant Doorkeeper to each House shall be allowed, in full compensation for all his services, the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars per annum; and it shall be the duty of the said Doorkeepers to do the usual services pertaining to their respective offices during the session of Congress, and, in the recess, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to take care of the apartments occupied by the respective Houses, and provide fuel and other accommodations for their subsequent session; and the said compensation shall be certified and paid in like manner as is provided by law for the other officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for altering the times for holding the Circuit Courts, in certain districts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the Circuit Courts in the districts of North Carolina and Georgia shall be held as follows, to wit: In the district of North Carolina, on the first day of June and the thirtieth day of November, at Newbern, in the present and each succeeding year; and all writs and recognizances returnable, and suits and other proceedings that were continued to the Circuit Court for the district of North Carolina on the eighteenth day of June next, shall now be returned and held continued to the same Court on the first day of June next. In the district of Georgia, on the twenty-fifth day of April, at Savannah, and on the eighth day of November, at Augusta, in the present and each succeeding year, except when any of those days shall happen on Sunday, in which case, the Court shall be held on the Monday following.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sessions of the Circuit Courts in the Eastern Circuit shall, in the present and every succeeding year, commence at the times following, that is to say: In New York district on the fifth day of April and the fifth day of September; in Connecticut district, on the twenty-fifth day of April and the twenty-fifth day of September; in Massachusetts district, on the twelfth day of May and twelfth day of October; in New Hampshire district, on the twenty-fourth day of May and the twenty-fourth day of October; and in Rhode Island district, on the seventh day of June and the seventh day of November, except when any of those days shall happen on a Sunday, and then the session shall commence on the next day following. And the sessions of the Circuit Court shall be held in the district of Virginia, at the city of Richmond only; in New Hampshire district, at Portsmouth; and Exeter alternately, beginning at the first; in Massachusetts district, at Boston; in Rhode Island district, at Newport and Providence alternately, beginning at the first; in Connecticut district, at Hartford and New Haven alternately, beginning at the last; and in New York district, at the city of New York only.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, at each session of the Supreme Court of the United States, or as soon after as may be, the Judges of the Supreme Court attending at such session shall, in writing, subscribed with their names, (which writing shall be lodged with the Clerk of the Supreme Court, and safely kept in his office,) assign to the said Judges, respectively, the circuits which they are to attend at the ensuing sessions of the Circuit Courts; which assignment shall be made in such manner that no Judge, unless by his own consent, shall have assigned to him any circuit which he has already attended, until the same has been afterwards attended by every other of the said Judges: Provided, always, That if the public service or the convenience of the Judges shall at any time, in their opinion, require a different arrangement, the same may take place, with the consent of any four of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the District Court for the district of Maine, which, by the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," is holden on the first Tuesday of June, annually, at Portland, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be holden on the third Tuesday of June, annually, anything in the act aforesaid to the contrary notwithstanding; and all writs and recognizances returnable, and suits and other proceedings that were continued to the District Court for the district of Maine on the first Tuesday of June next, shall now be returnable and held continued to the same Court on the third Tuesday of June next.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the stated District Courts for the district of North Carolina shall, in future, be held at the towns of Newbern, Wilmington, and Edenton, in rotation, beginning at Newbern, as the said Court now stands adjourned.

Approved, April 13, 1792.

An Act to compensate the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the occupation of, and damages done to, the said school during the late war.

Be it enacted, &c., That, as an indemnification to the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the use and occupation of the said school, and the damages done to the same by the troops of the United States, during the late war, there be granted to the said Corporation of Trustees a reasonable compensation, payable out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury of the United States, which compensation shall be ascertained by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Approved, April 13, 1792.

An Act for apportioning Representatives among the several States according to the First Enumeration.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected agreeably to a ratio of one member for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State, computed according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution, that is to say: Within the State of New Hampshire, four; within the State of Massachusetts, fourteen; within the State of Vermont, two; within the State of Rhode Island, two; within the State of Connecticut, seven; within the State of New York, ten; within the State of New Jersey, five; within the State of Pennsylvania, thirteen; within the State of Delaware, one; within the State of Maryland, eight; within the State of Virginia, nineteen; within the State of Kentucky, two; within the State of North Carolina, ten; within the State of South Carolina, six; and within the State of Georgia, two members.

Approved, April 14, 1792.

the country permit, to take possession of the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States, other than seamen belonging to any ship or vessel, who shall die within their Consulate, leaving there no legal representative, partner in trade, or trustee by him appointed to take care of his effects; they shall inventory the same, with the assistance of two merchants of the United States, or, for want of them, of any others, at their choice; shall collect the debts due to the deceased in the country where he died, and pay the debts due from his estate which he shall have there contracted; shall sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts, and, at the expiration of one year from his decease, shall transmit to the Treasury of the United States, to be holden in trust for the legal claimants; but, if, at any time before such transmission, the legal representative of the deceased shall appear and demand his effects in their hands, they shall deliver them up, being paid their fees, and shall cease their proceedings. For the information of the representative of the deceased, it shall be the duty of the Consul or Vice Consul authorized to proceed, as aforesaid, in the settlement of his estate, immediately to notify his death in one of the gazettes published in the Consulate, and also to the Secretary of State, that the same may be notified in the State to which the deceased shall belong; and he shall also, as soon as may be, transmit to the Secretary of State an inventory of the effects of the deceased, taken as before directed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Consuls and Vice Consuls, in cases where ships or vessels of the United States shall be stranded on the coasts of their Consulates, respectively, shall, as far as the laws of the country will permit, take proper measures as well for the purpose of saving the said ships or vessels, their cargoes, and appurtenances, as for storing and securing the effects and merchandise saved, and for taking an inventory or inventories thereof; and the merchandise and effects saved, with the inventory or inventories thereof, taken as aforesaid, shall, after deducting therefrom the expense, be delivered to the owner or owners: Provided, That no Consul or Vice Consul shall have authority to take possession of any such goods, wares, merchandise, or other property, when the master, owner, or consignee thereof is present or capable of taking possession of the same.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for every Consul and Vice Consul of the United States to take and receive the following fees of office for the services which he shall have performed: For authenticating under the Consular seal every protest, declaration, deposition, or other act, which such captains, masters, mariners, seamen, passengers, merchants, or others, as are citizens of the United States, may respectively choose to make, the sum of two dollars; for the taking into possession, inventorying, selling, and finally settling and paying, or transmitting, ting as aforesaid, the balance due on the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States who shall die within the limits of his Consulate, five per centum on the gross amount of such estate; for taking into possession and otherwise proceeding on any such estate which shall be delivered over to the legal representative before a final settlement of the same, as is hereinbefore directed, two-and-a-half per centum on such part delivered over as shall not be in money, and five per centum on the gross amount of the residue. And it shall be the duty of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the United States to give receipts for all fees which they shall receive by virtue of this act, expressing the particular services for which they are paid.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in case it be found necessary for the interest of the United States that a Consul or Consuls be appointed to reside on the coast of Barbary, the President be authorized to allow an annual salary, not exceeding two thousand dollars to each person so to be appointed: Provided, That such salary be not allowed to more than one Consul for any one of the States on the said coast.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every Consul and Vice Consul shall, before they enter on the execution of their trusts, or if already in the execution of the same, within one year from the passing of this act, or if resident in Asia, within two years, give bond, with such sureties as shall be approved by the Secretary of State, in a sum of not less than two thousand nor more than ten thousand dollars, conditioned for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law, and also for truly accounting for all moneys, goods, and effects, which may come into his possession by virtue of this act; and the said bond shall be lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, to prevent the mariners and seamen employed in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, in cases of shipwreck, sickness, or captivity, from suffering in foreign ports, it shall be the duty of the Consuls and Vice Consuls, respectively, from time to time, to provide for them in the most reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States, subject to such instructions as the Secretary of State shall give, and not exceeding an allowance of twelve cents to a man per diem. And all masters and commanders of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound to some port of the same, are hereby required and enjoined to take such mariners or seamen on board of their ships or vessels, at the request of the said Consuls or Vice Consuls, respectively, and to transport them to the port in the United States to which such ships or vessels may be bound, free of costs or charge; but that the said mariners or seamen shall, if able, be bound to do duty on board such ships or vessels, according to their several abilities: Provided, That no master or captain of any ship or vessel shall be obliged to take a greater number than two men to every one hundred tons burden of the said ship or vessel, on any one voyage; and if any such captain or master shall refuse the same, on the request or order of the Consul or Vice Consul, such captain or master shall forfeit and pay the sum of thirty dollars for each mariner or seaman so refused, to be recovered for the benefit of the United States by the said Consul or Vice Consul, in his own name, in any Court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, where a ship or vessel, belonging to citizens of the United States, is sold in a foreign port or place, the master, unless the crew are liable by their contract, or do consent to be discharged there, shall send them back to the State where they entered on board, or furnish them with means sufficient for their return, to be ascertained by the Consul or Vice Consul of the United States having jurisdiction of the port or place; and, in case of the master's refusal, the said Consul or Vice Consul may (if the laws of the land permit it) cause his ship, goods, and person, to be arrested and held until he shall comply with his duty herein.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the specification of certain powers and duties, in this act, to be exercised or performed by the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the United States, shall not be construed to the exclusion of others resulting from the nature of their appointments, or any Treaty or Convention under which they may act.

Approved, April 14, 1792.

An Act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates.

Be it enacted, &c., That a certain contract expressed in an indenture executed on the twenty-seventh day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between the then Board of Treasury for the United States of America, of the one part, and Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent, as agents for the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates, of the other part, so far as the same respects the following described tract of land, that is to say: Beginning at a station where the western boundary line of the seventh range of townships (laid out by the authority of the United States in Congress assembled) intersects the river Ohio; thence extending along that river southwesterly to a place where the western boundary line of the fifteenth range of townships (when laid out agreeably to the land ordinance passed the twentieth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five) would touch the said river; thence running northerly on the said western bounds of the said fifteenth range of townships, till a line drawn due east to the western boundary line of the said seventh range of townships, will comprehend, with the other lines of this tract, seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, besides the several lots and parcels of land in the said contract reserved or appropriated to particular purposes; thence running east to the western boundary line of the said seventh range of townships; and thence along the said line to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby confirmed; and that the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to issue letters patent in the name and under the seal of the United States, thereby granting and conveying to Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, the said described tract of land, with the reservations in the said indenture expressed, in trust for the persons composing the said Ohio Company of Associates, according to their several rights and interests, and for their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in trust, for the uses above expressed, one other tract of two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres of land: Provided, That the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, or either of them, shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, within six months, warrants which issued for Army bounty rights, sufficient for that purpose, according to the provision of a resolve of Congress of the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, in trust for the uses above expressed, a further quantity of one hundred thousand acres of land: Provided, always, nevertheless, That the said grant of one hundred thousand acres shall be made on the express condition of becoming void for such part thereof as the said Company shall not have, within five years from the passing of this act, conveyed in fee simple, as a bounty, and free of expense, in tracts of one hundred acres, to each male person not less than eighteen years of age, being an actual settler at the time of such conveyance.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said quantities of two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres, and of one hundred thousand acres, shall be located within the limits of the tract of one million five hundred thousand acres of land, described in the indenture aforesaid, and adjoining to the tract of land described in the first section of this act, and in such form as the President, in the letters patent, shall prescribe for that purpose.

Approved, April 21, 1792.

An Act for raising a further Sum of Money for the Protection of the Frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, the duties now in force upon the articles hereinafter enumerated and described, at their importation into the United States, shall cease, and that in lieu thereof, there shall be thenceforth laid, levied, and collected upon the said articles, at their said importation, the several and respective rates or duties following, viz:

Wines, namely: Madeira, of the quality of London particular, per gallon, fifty-six cents; Madeira, of the quality of London market, per gallon, forty-nine cents; other Madeira wine, per gallon, forty cents; Sherry, per gallon, thirty-three cents; Saint Lucar, per gallon, thirty cents; Lisbon, per gallon, twenty-five cents; Oporto, per gallon, twenty-five cents; Tenerife and Fayal, per gallon, twenty cents. All other wines, forty per centum ad valorem, provided that the amount of the duty thereupon shall, in no case, exceed thirty cents per gallon.

Spirits, distilled wholly or chiefly from grain: Of the first class of proof, per gallon, twenty-eight cents; of the second class of proof, per gallon, twenty-nine cents; of the third class of proof, per gallon, thirty-one cents; of the fourth class of proof, per gallon, thirty-four cents; of the fifth class of proof, per gallon, forty cents; of the sixth class of proof, per gallon, forty cents; of the sixth class of proof, per gallon, fifty cents.

All other distilled spirits: Of the second class of proof and under, per gallon, twenty-five cents; of the third class of proof and under, per gallon, twenty-eight cents; of the fourth class of proof and under, per gallon, thirty-two cents; of the fifth class of proof and under, per gallon, thirty-eight cents; of the sixth class of proof and under, per gallon, forty-four cents. Which several classes or denominations of proof shall be deemed and taken to correspond with those mentioned in the "act repealing," after the last day of June next, the duties hereinafter laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States and for appropriating the same."

Beer, ale, and porter, per gallon, eight cents; steel, per hundred weight, one hundred cents; nails, per pound, two cents; cocoa, per pound, two cents; chocolate, per pound, three cents; playing cards, per pack, twenty-five cents; shoes and slippers of silk, twenty cents; all other shoes and slippers for men and women, clogs and golo-shoes, ten cents; all other shoes and slippers for children, seven cents; on hemp, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred cents; on cables, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred and eighty cents; on tarred cordage, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred and eighty cents; on untarred cordage and yarn, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, two hundred and twenty-five cents; on twine and packthread, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, four hundred cents; on coal, per bushel, four and a half cents; on salts, called Glauber salts, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, two hundred cents.

Articles ad valorem: China wares, looking glass, window and other glass, and all manufactures of glass, black quart bottles excepted; muskets, pistols, and other fire-arms; swords, cutlasses, hangers and other side arms; starch; hair powder; wafers; glue; laces, lines, fringes, tassels, and trimmings commonly used by upholsterers, coach-makers and saddlers, and paper-hangings; painters' colors, whether dry or ground in oil—fifteen per centum ad valorem—cast, slit, and rolled iron, and, generally, all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of these metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated, brass and iron wire excepted; cabinet wares; leather tanned and tawed, and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not otherwise particularly enumerated; medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing; hats, caps, and bonnets of every sort; gloves and mittens; stockings; millinery ready made; artificial flowers, feathers and other ornaments for women's head-dresses; fans; dolls, dressed and undressed; toys; buttons of every kind; carpets and carpeting, mats and floor cloths; sail cloth; sheathing and cartridge paper; all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, or other preparations or compositions commonly called sweet scents, odors, perfumes, or cosmetics; all dentifrice-powders, tinctures, preparations, or compositions whatsoever, for the teeth or gums—ten per centum ad valorem.

Sec. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That all articles which are excepted and exempted from duty by the "act making further provision for the payment of the Debts of the United States," shall continue to be so excepted and exempted; and that, to the articles heretofore made free from duty, the following shall be added, namely: copper in pigs and bars, lapis calaminaris, unmanufactured wool, wood, and sulphur.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, in computing the duty heretofore laid upon salt, a bushel of salt shall be deemed not to exceed the weight of fifty-six pounds avoirdupois; and as often as the actual salt shall be charged in the proportion of the present rate of duty per bushel for every fifty-six pounds of its actual weight.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, after the said last day of June next, there shall be laid, levied, and collected, in addition to the present duty thereupon, a duty of two and a half per centum ad valorem, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, not above enumerated or described, which, if imported in ships or vessels of the United States, are now chargeable with a duty of five per centum ad valorem.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the addition of ten per centum made by the second section of the "act making further provision for the Debts of the United States," to the rates of duties on goods, wares and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, shall continue in full force and operation, after the said last day of June next, in relation to the articles herein before enumerated and described.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all drawbacks and allowances authorized by the act aforesaid, which have not been heretofore abolished or changed, shall continue to operate, as in the said act prescribed in relation to the several duties which shall become payable by virtue of this act; and that, in addition thereto, there shall be allowed and paid upon provisions salted within the United States, except upon dried fish, upon the exportation thereof to any foreign port or place, as follows, to wit: On pickled fish, at the rate of eight cents per barrel, and on other provisions at the rate of five cents per barrel; and from and after the first day of January next, there shall be an addition of twenty per centum to the allowances, respectively granted to ships or vessels employed in the Bank or other cod-fisheries, and in the terms provided by an act, entitled "An act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," and during the continuance of the said act.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all duties, drawbacks, and allowances, which, by virtue of this act, shall be payable or allowable on any specific quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be deemed to apply, in proportion, to any quantity more or less than such specific quantity.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the term of credit for the payment of duties on salt shall be nine months, and on all articles, the produce of the West Indies, salt excepted, where the amount of the duty to be paid by one person or co-partnership shall exceed fifty dollars, shall be four months, and that the duties on all other articles, except wines and teas, which shall be imported after the last day of June next, shall be payable, one half in six, one quarter in nine, and the other quarter in twelve calendar months, from the time of each respective importation.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," and as touching the duties on distilled spirits only, the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," shall extend to, and be in full force for the collection of the duties specified and laid in and by this act, and generally as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing therein contained, had been herein inserted and re-enacted.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all wines which, after the said last day of June next, shall be imported into the United States, shall be landed under the care of the inspector of the port where the same shall be landed, and for that purpose, every permit for landing any wines, which shall be granted by a collector, shall, prior to such landing, be produced to the said inspector who, by endorsement thereupon under his hand, shall signify the production thereof to him, and the time when, after which, and not otherwise, on pain of forfeiture, it shall be lawful to land the said wines. And the said inspector shall make an entry of all such permits, and of the contents thereof, and each pipe, butt, hoghead, cask, case, box, or package whatsoever, containing such wines, shall be marked by the officer under whose immediate inspection the same shall be landed, in legible and durable characters, with progressive numbers, the name of the said officer, and the quality or kind of wine, as herein before enumerated and distinguished. And the said officer shall grant a certificate for each such pipe, butt, hoghead, cask, case, box, or package, specifying therein the name or names of the importer or importers, the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, and the number thereof, to accompany the same wheresoever it shall be sent. And if any pipe, butt, hoghead, cask, case, box, or package, containing wine, shall be found without such marks and certificates, the same shall be liable to be seized, and the want of such marks and certificates shall be presumptive evidence that such wine was unlawfully imported and landed.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall have in his or her possession wines which are intended for sale, in quantity exceeding one hundred and fifty gallons, shall, prior to the said last day of June next, make entry thereof, in writing, at some office of inspection in the city, town, or county where he or she shall reside, specifying and describing the casks, cases, boxes, and other packages containing the same; and the kinds, qualities, and quantities thereof; and where and in whose possession they are; and the officer of inspection, at whose office such entry may be made, shall, as soon as may be thereafter, visit and inspect, or cause to be visited and inspected, the wines so reported; and shall mark, or cause to be marked, the casks, cases, boxes, and packages, containing the same, with progressive numbers, with the name of the person to whom the same may belong, the kind or kinds thereof, and the words "Old Stock," and shall grant a certificate for each cask, case, box, or package, containing such wine, describing therein the said cask, case, box, or package, and the wines therein contained, which certificate shall accompany the same, wherever it may be sent. And if any person who may have wines in his or her possession for sale, shall not, prior to the said last day of June next, make entry thereof, as above directed, he or she, for such omission or neglect, shall forfeit and pay the value of the wine omitted to be entered, to be recovered with costs of suit, for the benefit of any person who shall give information thereof; and the wines, so omitted to be entered, shall be forfeited.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of December next, no beer, ale, or porter, shall be brought into the United States, from any foreign port or place, except in casks or vessels, the capacity whereof shall not be less than forty gallons, or in packages containing not less than six dozen of bottles, on pain of forfeiture of the said beer, ale, or porter, and of the ship or vessel, in which the same shall be brought.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the several and respective duties, aforesaid, except that mentioned in the fourth section of this act, shall continue to be levied, collected, and paid, until the debts and purposes, to and for which the duties, hereby directed to cease after the last day of June next, were pledged and appropriated, shall have been fully paid and satisfied; and that so much thereof, as may be necessary, shall be, and are hereby pledged and appropriated, in the same manner, for the same purposes, and with the same force and effect, as those, which are hereby directed to cease after the said last day of June next; and that so much of the residue thereof, as may be necessary, shall be, and are hereby appropriated for making good deficiencies in any funds which may have been designated for satisfying grants and appropriations heretofore made.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the additional duty of two-and-a-half per centum ad valorem, specified in the fourth section of this act, shall continue for the term of two years, from the commencement thereof, and no longer.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, out of the surplus of the duties, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and a further sum of five hundred and twenty-three thousand five hundred dollars, out of the surplus of the duties hereby established as the same shall accrue, making, together, the sum of six hundred and seventy-three thousand five hundred dollars, shall be, and are hereby appropriated and applied, in addition to any former appropriation for the Military Establishment of the United States, towards carrying into execution the act, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States."

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be empowered to take on loan, on account of the United States, from the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of the United States, who are hereby authorized and empowered to lend the same, or from any other body politic or corporate within the United States, or from any other person or persons, the whole or any part of the aforesaid sum of five hundred and twenty-three thousand five hundred dollars, to be applied to the purpose, to and for which the same is above appropriated, and to be reimbursed out of the aforesaid surplus of the duties by this act imposed, which surplus is, accordingly, appropriated to the said reimbursement: Provided, That the rate of interest of such loans shall not exceed five per centum per annum, and that the principal thereof may be reimbursed at pleasure of the United States.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," as hath rated the livre tournois of France at eighteen-and-a-half cents, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 18. And be it enacted and declared, That if the principal, in any bond which shall be given to the United States, for duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, shall be insolvent; or if such principal being dead, his or her estate and effects, which shall have come to the hands of his or her executors, or administrators, shall be insufficient for the payment of his or her debts; and if in either of the said cases any surety in the said bond, or the executors and administrators of such surety, shall pay to the United States the moneys thereupon due, such surety, his or her executors or administrators shall have and enjoy the like advantage, priority, and preference, for the recovery and receipt of the said moneys out of the estate and effects of such insolvent or deceased principal, as are reserved and secured to the United States, by the forty-fourth section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," and shall and may bring and maintain a suit upon the said bond, in law or equity, in his, her, or their own name or names, for the recovery of the moneys which shall have been paid thereupon. And it is further declared, That the cases of insolvency in the said forty-fourth section mentioned, shall be deemed to extend, as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his or her debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof, for the benefit of his or her creditors, or in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor, shall have been attached by process of law, as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall have been committed.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint such place within the district of Vermont to be the port of entry and delivery within the said district, as he may deem expedient, anything in the act, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Vermont," to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, May 2, 1792.

An Act to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper; and in case of an insurrection in any State against the Government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, or as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States by an Associate Justice or the District Judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and if the militia of a State where such combinations may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto as may be necessary; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, and previous thereto, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the militia employed in the service of the United States shall receive the same pay and allowances as the troops of the United States who may be in service at the same time, or who were last in service, and shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war; and that no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in any of the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay and not less than one month's pay; and such officer shall, moreover, be liable to be cashiered by sentence of a court-martial; and such non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned by a like sentence on failure of payment of the fines adjudged against them, for the space of one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all fines, to be assessed as aforesaid, shall be certified by the presiding officer of the court-martial before whom the same shall be assessed to the marshal of the district in which the delinquent shall reside, or to one of his deputies, and also to the supervisor of the revenue of the same district, who shall record the said certificate in a book to be kept for that purpose; the said marshal or his deputy shall forthwith proceed to levy the said fines, with costs, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the delinquent, which costs, and the manner of proceeding with respect to the sale of the goods distrained, shall be agreeable to the laws of the State in which the same shall be in other cases of distress; and where any non-commissioned officer or private shall be adjudged to suffer imprisonment, there being no goods or chattels to be found whereof to levy the said fines, the marshal of the district or his deputy may commit such delinquent to jail during the term for which he shall be so adjudged to imprisonment, or until the fine shall be paid, in the same manner as other persons condemned to fine and imprisonment at the suit of the United States may be committed.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the marshals and their deputies shall pay all such fines by them levied to the supervisor of the revenue, in the district in which they are collected, within two months after they shall have received the same, deducting therefrom five per centum as a compensation for their trouble; and in case of failure, the same shall be recoverable by action of debt or information in any Court of the United States, of the district in which such fines shall be levied having cognizance thereof, to be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, in the name of the supervisor of the district, with interest and costs.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the several districts and their deputies shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law, in executing the laws of their respective States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

Approved, May 2, 1792.

An Act for the relief of persons imprisoned for Debt.

Be it enacted, &c., That persons imprisoned on executions issuing from any Court of the United States for satisfaction of judgments in any civil actions, shall be entitled to like privileges of the yards or limits of the respective jails, as persons confined in such jails for debt on judgments rendered in the Courts of the several States are entitled to, and under the like regulations and restrictions.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person imprisoned as aforesaid may have the oath or affirmation hereinafter expressed administered to him by any Judge of the United States, or of the General or Supreme Court of Law of the State in which the debtor is imprisoned, the creditor, his agent, or attorney, if either live within one hundred miles of the place of imprisonment, or within the district in which the judgment was rendered, having at least thirty days' previous notice, by a citation served on him, issued by any such Judge, to appear at the time therein mentioned at the said jail, if he see fit, to show cause why the said oath or affirmation should not be so administered; at which time and place, if no sufficient cause, in the opinion of the Judge, be shown, or doth from examination appear to the contrary, he may, at the request of the debtor, proceed to administer to him the following oath or affirmation, as the case may be, viz: "You, ———, solemnly swear (or affirm) that you have not estate, real or personal, nor is any to your knowledge, holden in trust for you to the amount or value of twenty dollars, nor sufficient to pay the debt for which you are imprisoned." Which oath or affirmation being administered, the Judge shall certify the same, under his hand, to the prison-keeper, and shall fix a reasonable allowance for the debtor's support, not exceeding one dollar per week; and, if the creditor shall thereafter, any week fail to furnish the debtor with such weekly support, by paying or advancing the money to him, or to the prison-keeper, for his use, the debtor shall be discharged from his imprisonment, on such judgment, and shall not be liable to be imprisoned again for the said debt; but the judgment shall remain good and sufficient in law, and may be satisfied out of any estate which may then, or at any time afterwards, belong to the debtor.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely take the oath or affirmation aforesaid, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and suffer the pains and penalties in that case provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the space of one year from the passing thereof, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to issue letters patent in the name and under the seal of the United States, thereby granting and conveying to John Cleves Symmes and his associates, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, such number of acres of land as the payments already made by the said John Cleves Symmes, his agents, or associates, under their contract of the fifteenth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, will pay for, estimating the lands at two-thirds of a dollar per acre, and making the reservations specified in the said contract.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, one other tract of one hundred and six thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven acres, with the reservations as aforesaid: Provided, That the said John Cleves Symmes, or his agents or associates, or any of them, shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, within six months, warrants which issued for Army bounty rights sufficient for that purpose, according to the provision of the resolves of Congress of the twenty-third of July and second of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; but, in case so many warrants should not be delivered, then the letters patent last aforesaid to be given for such number of acres as shall be in proportion to the warrants so delivered.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey unto the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, their heirs, and assigns, in trust for the purpose of establishing an Academy and other Public Schools and Seminaries of Learning, one complete township, conformably to an order of Congress of the second of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, made in consequence of the application of the said John Cleves Symmes, for the purchase of the tract aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several quantities of land to be granted and conveyed as aforesaid, shall be included and located within such limits and lines of boundary as the President may judge expedient, agreeably to an act passed the twelfth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, "for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes."

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next annual meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday in November next.

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act concerning the Duties on Spirits distilled within the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, the present duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, shall cease, and that, in lieu thereof, upon all spirits which, after the said day, shall be distilled within the United States wholly or in part from molasses, sugar, or other foreign materials, there shall be paid the duties following: that is to say—

For every gallon of those spirits of the first class of proof, ten cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the second class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the third class of proof, twelve cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fourth class of proof, fourteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, eighteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, twenty-five cents. And upon all spirits which after the said day shall be distilled within the United States from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, in any city, town, or village, at any distillery at which there shall be one or more stills which singly or together shall be of the capacity of four hundred gallons or upwards, there shall be paid the duties following: that is to say—For every gallon of those spirits of the first class of proof, seven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the second class of proof, eight cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the third class of proof, nine cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fourth class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, thirteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, eighteen cents. And upon stills which after the said day shall be employed in distilling spirits from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, at any other place than a city, town, or village, or at any distillery in a city, town, or village at which there shall be one or more stills, which singly, if only one, or together, if more than one, shall be of less capacity than four hundred gallons, there shall be paid the yearly duty of fifty-four cents for every gallon English wine measure of the capacity or content of each and every such still, including the head thereof: Provided, That it shall be at the option of the proprietor or possessor of any such still, instead of the said yearly duty, either to pay seven cents for every gallon of spirits by him or her distilled, or to pay at the rate of ten cents per gallon of the capacity for each and every month of the employment of any such still; and in case the said proprietor or possessor shall elect to pay either the said rate of seven cents per gallon, or the said rate of ten cents, according to the capacity of his or her still or stills, he or she at the time of making entry of his or her still or stills in manner herein-after directed, shall by writing under his or her hand, left at the office of inspection where such entry shall be made, notify the said election, and if the same shall be to pay the said monthly rate of ten cents, shall demand a license for the term of time, specifying the day of commencing and the day of ending, during which he or she shall intend to work his or her still or stills, which license shall, without delay or expense to the said proprietor or possessor, be granted, and shall be countersigned by the officer at whose office application for the same shall have been made. And in the case of an election, to pay the said monthly rate of ten cents, it shall not be lawful for any person by whom the same shall have been made, to work his or her still or stills at any time, within the year from the date of his or her entry thereof, other than that for which a license shall have been granted, unless he or she shall have previously obtained another license for such further time, which upon like application shall and may be granted in like manner; and if any such person shall work his or her still or stills contrary to the direction or provision aforesaid, he or she shall forfeit and pay for every such offence two hundred dollars. And in every case in which any proprietor or possessor of a still or stills subject to the payment of duty according to the capacity of such still or stills, shall not make election to pay according to one or the other of the alternatives aforesaid, or shall not duly comply therewith, he or she shall be liable to pay, and shall pay, the said yearly rate of fifty-four cents for every gallon of the capacity or capacities of his or her still or stills. SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be in each county comprehended within any district at least one office of inspection, at which every person having or keeping a still or stills within such county shall, between the last day of May and the first day of July in each year, make entry of such still or stills, and at which every person, who, being a resident within the county, shall procure a still or stills, or who, removing within a county, shall bring therein a still or stills, shall, within thirty days after such procuring or removal, and before he or she shall begin to use such still or stills, make entry thereof. And every entry, besides describing each still and the capacity thereof, shall specify the place where, and the person in whose possession it is, and the purpose for which it is intended, as whether for sale or use in distilling; and, in the case of removal, shall specify the place from which every such still shall have been brought.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every proprietor and possessor of a still shall be jointly and severally liable for the duty thereupon; and that every owner of land upon which any still shall be worked shall be liable for the duty thereupon, unless the same shall be worked by a lawful and bona fide tenant of the land of an estate, not less than for the term of one year, or unless such owner can make it appear that the possessor of, or person by whom, such still shall have been worked, was, during the whole time of working the same, a trespasser or intruder on his land.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every officer of inspection within whose survey any distillery of Geneva or sweet cordials, subject to the payment of duty by the gallon of the spirits distilled thereon may be, shall forbear to visit or inspect for a space not exceeding two hours in each day such part of the said distillery as he may be required by the proprietor, possessor, or manager of such distillery to forbear to visit and inspect, for which purpose it shall be necessary for the said proprietor, possessor, or manager to give notice, in writing, to the said officer, describing therein particularly the part of such distillery which it shall be his desire that the said officer may forbear to visit and inspect, and specifying the time of each day for which such forbearance shall be desired.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate as well the marks to be set upon the casks, vessels, and packages, containing distilled spirits, as the forms of the certificates which are to accompany the same; and that when any cask or vessel in which distilled spirits have been contained shall have been emptied of its contents, it shall be lawful for the marks thereupon to be effaced by, or in the presence of, an officer of inspection; and if the said cask or vessel shall afterwards be used for putting therein other spirits, the same may be marked anew.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, instead of a notice of twenty-four hours, heretofore required to be given, of the intent to export distilled spirits, in order to the benefit of the drawback of the duties thereupon, six hours shall be sufficient.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be an abatement for leakage at the rate of two per cent., in every case in which the duty shall be payable by the gallon of the spirits distilled, to be allowed at the distillery where such spirits shall be made.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officer of inspection within whose survey any still shall be, the duty whereupon is payable according to the capacity of the still, shall identify, by progressive numbers and other proper marks, every such still within his survey, and the duty thereupon shall operate as a specific lien upon the said still.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That every distiller of, and dealer in, spirits who may have in his or her possession distilled spirits not made or certified, pursuant to the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States," shall, prior to the last day of September next, report the spirits in his or her possession, in writing, at some office of inspection, to the end that such spirits may be marked and certified as Old Stock. And that, from and after the last day of September next, casks and vessels of the capacity of twenty gallons and upwards, containing distilled spirits, which shall be found in the possession of any distiller or dealer in spirits, except at a distillery where the same were made, or in going from one place to another, without being marked according to law, or without having a certificate from some proper officer, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture; and that it shall be the duty of the several officers of inspection, upon request of any dealer or distiller, to take measures for the marking of casks, vessels, and packages containing distilled spirits, and to furnish such dealer or distiller, free from expense, with certificates to accompany the same: Provided, That it shall not be incumbent upon any such officer to mark or certify any cask, vessel, or package which ought to have been before marked or certified according to any law of the United States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, no distilled spirits, except arrack and sweet cordials, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in casks or vessels of the capacity of ninety gallons and upwards. SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That no drawback of the duty on distilled spirits which shall be exported after the last day of June next, shall be allowed upon any quantity less than one hundred gallons.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, after the last day of June next, no distilled spirits shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place in any cask or vessel which shall have been marked pursuant to any law of the United States concerning distilled spirits, on pain of forfeiture of the spirits so brought, and of the ship or vessel in which they shall be brought.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the owner or possessor of any still or stills shall neglect to make entry thereof, within the time and in the manner prescribed by the second section of this act, such owner or possessor shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars; and if any distilled spirits, except arrack and sweet cordials, shall, after the last day of April next, be brought into the United States in casks or vessels of less capacity than ninety gallons, all such spirits, and the casks and vessels containing the same, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture, and every such penalty or forfeiture shall be one-half to the use of the United States, and the other half to the use of the person who shall first discover and make known the matter or thing whereby the same shall have been incurred.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted and declared, That the duties hereby laid shall continue in force for the same time, and are hereby pledged and appropriated to and for the same purposes as those in lieu of which they are laid, and pursuant to the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same."

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That to make good any deficiency which may happen in consequence of the reduction hereby made in the rates of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, so much of the product of the duties laid by the act entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," as may be necessary shall be, and is hereby, pledged and appropriated to the same purposes, to and for which the duties hereby reduced were pledged and appropriated.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to make such allowances for their respective services to the supervisors, inspectors, and other officers of inspection as he shall deem reasonable and proper, so as the said allowances, together with the incidental expenses of collecting the duties on spirits distilled within the United States shall not exceed seven-and-a-half per centum of the total product of the duties on distilled spirits for the period to which the said allowances shall relate, computing from the time the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States," and for appropriating the same," took effect: And, provided, also, That such allowance shall not exceed the annual amount of seventy thousand dollars, until the same shall be further ascertained by law.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," shall extend to, and be in full force for, the collection of the several duties herein before mentioned, and for the recovery and distribution of the penalties and forfeitures herein contained, and generally for the execution of this act, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing therein contained were inserted in, and re-enacted by, this present act, subject only to the alterations hereby made.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of Import and Tonnage.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, in addition to the fees and emoluments which may accrue to the officers employed in the collection of the duties of import and tonnage, by the provisions already made, they shall severally have, and be entitled to the respective allowances following, to wit: The surveyors of Newburyport, Salem, Saint Mary's, and Wilmington, in North Carolina, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars, each; the surveyors of Beverley, North Kingston, East Greenwich, Warren, Bristol, Pawcatuck River, Providence, Patuxet, New Haven, Lewellensburg, Alexandria, Beaufort, Hertford, Winton, Bennet's Creek, Plymouth, Windsor, Skewarkey, Murfreesborough, Nixon-ton, Indian Town, Currituck Inlet, Pasquotank River Bridge and Newbiggen Creek, the yearly sum of eighty dollars each; the surveyor of Portsmouth, the yearly sum of sixty dollars; the surveyor of Ipswich, Portland, Newport, Stonington, Middletown, Bermuda Hundred, Petersburg, Richmond, and Savannah, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the surveyors of Gloucester, New London, and Swansborough, the yearly sum of thirty dollars, each; the surveyors of Hudson, Little Egg Harbor, Suffolk, Smithfield, Urbana, and Fredericksburg, the yearly sum of twenty dollars, each; the collector of the district of Wilmington, in North Carolina, the yearly sum of one hundred and fifty dollars; the collectors of the districts of Portsmouth, Gloucester, Albany, Annapolis, Vienna, Nottingham, Yorktown, Dumfries and Louisville, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars, each; the collector of the district of Fairfield, the yearly sum of eighty dollars; the collectors of the districts of Marblehead, Plymouth, Barnstable, Nantucket, New Bedford, Dighton, York, Biddeford and Penobscot, Bath, Wiscasset, Machias, Newport, New Haven, Perth Amboy, Great Egg Harbor, Wilmington, in Delaware, Chester, Cedarpoint,

Georgetown, Hampton, South Quay, Washington, Plank-bridge and Georgetown, in South Carolina, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the naval officer of the district of Portsmouth, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars; the naval officers of the districts of Newburyport, Newport, Providence, Wilmington, in North Carolina, and Savannah, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the collector of the district of Salem and Beverly, one fourth of one per centum on the amount of all moneys by him received on account of the said duties; and to the collectors of the districts of Portsmouth, Newburyport, Gloucester, Marblehead, Plymouth, Nantucket, Edgartown, New Bedford, Dighton, York, Biddeford and Penobscot, Portland, Bath, Wiscasset, Penobscot, Frenchman's Bay, Machias, Newport, Providence, New Haven, Fairfield, Perth Amboy, Burlington, Great Egg Harbor, Wilmington, in Delaware, Oxford, Vienna, Snow Hill, Annapolis, Nottingham, Cedarpoint, Georgetown, in Maryland, Hampton, Yorktown, Yeocomico, Dumfries, Foley Landing, Cherrystone, South Quay, Wilmington, in North Carolina, Newbern, Washington, Edenton, Plank-bridge, Georgetown, in South Carolina, Beaufort, and Savannah, each, one-half of one per centum on the amount of all moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties aforesaid.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the allowance of three-fourths of one per centum to the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and the city of New York, on the amount of all moneys by them respectively received, on account of the duties of import and tonnage, shall cease, and instead thereof, they shall, after that time, be entitled to one-half of one per centum on all such moneys by them respectively received.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the expense of fuel, office rent, and necessary stationery, for the collectors of the districts of Salem and Beverley, Boston and Charlestown, the cities of New York, Philadelphia and Charleston, the towns of Baltimore, Norfolk and Portsmouth, shall be paid, three-fourths by the said collectors, and the other fourth by the respective naval officers in those districts.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, whenever a collector shall die, the commissions, to which he would have been entitled on the receipt of all duties bonded by him, shall be equally divided between the legal representatives of such deceased collector and his successor in office, whose duty it shall be collect the same; and for this purpose the said representatives shall deliver over to such successor all the public or official books, papers, and accounts of the said deceased.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act to continue in force the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the penalties and forfeitures accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases," and to make further provision for the payment of Penalties to Invalids.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures and penalties accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases therein mentioned," shall be, and hereby is continued in full force for the term of three years, from the passing of this act, and no longer. Provided, That nothing in the said act shall be construed to limit or restrain the power of the President of the United States to grant pardons for offences against the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the yearly pensions which have been or may be, allowed by, or in pursuance of, any act or law of the United States, to persons who were wounded and disabled in the public service, shall, for the space of one year from the fourth day of March last, be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, under such regulations as the President of the United States may direct.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act supplementary to the Act for making provision for the Debt of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which hath not been subscribed pursuant to the terms proposed in the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," shall be, and it is hereby extended on the same terms as in and by the said act is provided, to the first day of March next; and books, for receiving such further subscriptions shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and by the Commissioners of Loans in each of the said States, on the first day of June next, which shall continue open until the said first day of March next, inclusively; for which purpose, the said Commissioners, respectively, are hereby invested with the like powers, and required to perform the like duties, as in and by the said act is directed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed, and shall not subscribe to the said Loan, shall nevertheless receive a rate per centum on the amount of so much of their respective demands, as well for interest as principal, as, on or before the first day of March shall be registered conformably to the directions of the said act, as shall be equal to the interest payable at the same times and places, which shall be payable at the same times and places, and by the same persons, as in and by the said act is directed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the term for receiving upon Loan that part of the Debts of the respective States which hath not been subscribed pursuant to the terms proposed in the act aforesaid, shall be, and it is hereby, enlarged on the same terms as in and by the said act is provided, until the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively; for which purpose, books shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and by the Commissioners of Loans in each of the said States, on the first day of June next, which shall continue open until the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three inclusively; for which purposes, the said Commissioners are hereby invested with the like powers, and required to perform the like duties, as in and by the said act is directed.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Loans for North Carolina shall not be allowed to receive any certificate issued by Patrick Travers, Commissioner of Cumberland county, or by the Commissioners of Army accounts at Warrenton.

Sec. 5. And, whereas the United States are indebted to certain foreign officers, on account of pay and services during the late war, the interest whereof, pursuant to the certificates granted to the said officers by virtue of a resolution of the United States in Congress assembled, is payable at the house of ——— grand banker, at Paris, and it is expedient to discharge the same: Be it therefore enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be discharged the principal and interest of the said Debt, out of any of the moneys which have been, or shall be obtained on Loan, in virtue of the act aforesaid, and which shall not be necessary ultimately to fulfil the purposes for which the said moneys are, in and by the said act, authorized to be borrowed.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, shall be Commissioners who, or any three of whom, are hereby authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to purchase the Debt of the United States, at its market price, if not exceeding the par or true value thereof; for which purchase, the interest on so much of the Public Debt as has already been, or may hereafter be, purchased for the United States, or as shall be paid into the Treasury, and so much of the moneys appropriated for the payment of the interest on the Foreign and Domestic Debt as shall exceed what may be sufficient for the payment of such interest to the creditors of the United States, shall be, and are hereby appropriated. And it shall be the duty of the said Commissioners to render to the Legislature, within two months after the commencement of the first session thereof in every year, a full and precise account of all such purchases made and Public Debt redeemed in pursuance of this act.

Sec. 7. And, whereas it is expedient to establish a fund for the gradual reduction of the Public Debt: Be it further enacted, That the interest on so much of the Debt of the United States as has been or shall be purchased or redeemed for by the United States, or as shall be paid into the Treasury thereof in satisfaction of any debt or demand, and the surplus of any sum or sums appropriated for the payment of the interest upon the said Debt, which shall remain after paying such interest, shall be, and hereby are, appropriated and pledged firmly and inviolably for and to the purchase and redemption of the said Debt, to be applied under the direction of the President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, or any three of them, with the approbation of the President of the United States, for the time being, in manner following, that is to say: First, to the purchase of the several species of stock constituting the Debt of the United States, at their respective market prices, not exceeding the par or true value thereof, and, as nearly as may be, in equal proportions, until the annual amount of the said funds, together with any other provisions which may be made by law, shall be equal to two per centum of the whole amount of the outstanding funded stock, bearing a present interest of six per centum; thenceforth, secondly, to the redemption of the said last-mentioned stock, according to the right for that purpose reserved to the United States, until the whole amount thereof shall have been redeemed; and lastly, after such redemption, to the purchase, at its market price, of any other stock consisting of the Debt of the United States, which may then remain unredeemed; and such purchase, as far as the fund shall at any time extend, shall be made within thirty days next after each day on which a quarterly payment of interest on the Debt of the United States shall become due, and shall be made by a known agent, to be named by the said Commissioners.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all future purchases of Public Debt on account of the United States, shall be made at the lowest price at which the same can be obtained by open purchase, or by receiving sealed proposals, to be opened in the presence of the Commissioners, or persons authorized by them to make purchases, and the persons making such proposals.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That quarterly accounts of the application of the said fund shall be rendered for settlement, as other public accounts, accompanied with returns of the sums of the said Debt, which shall have been from time to time purchased or redeemed; and full and exact report of the proceedings of the said Commissioners, including a statement of the disbursements which shall have been made, and of the sums which shall have been purchased or redeemed under their direction, and specifying dates, prices, parties, and places, shall be laid before Congress within the first fourteen days of each session which may ensue the present, during the execution of the said trust.

Approved, May 8, 1782.

An Act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be an accountant to the Department of War, who shall be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay of the Army, the subsistence of officers, bounties to soldiers, the expenses of the recruiting service, the incidental and contingent expenses of the Department; and who shall report, from time to time, all such settlements as shall have been made by him, for the inspection and revision of the accounting officers of the Treasury; and the said accountant shall also be charged with the settlement of all claims for personal service authorized by the act of this Congress, of the 27th of March last, and of all military claims lodged in the late office of the Paymaster General and Commissioner of Army accounts, which are not foreclosed by the acts of limitation of the late Congress, and he shall report, from time to time, all such settlements as have been made by him, for the inspection and revision of the Comptroller of the Treasury. The compensation of the said accountant shall be a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States shall disburse all such moneys as shall have been previously ordered for the use of the Department of War, by warrants from the Treasury; which disbursements shall be made pursuant to warrants from the Secretary of War, countersigned by the accountant.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be a Paymaster to reside near the headquarters of the troops of the United States. That it shall be the duty of the said Paymaster to receive from the Treasurer all the moneys which shall be intrusted to him for the purpose of paying the pay, the arrears of pay, subsistence, or forage due to the troops of the United States. That he shall receive the pay abstracts of the Paymasters of the several regiments or corps, and compare the same with the returns or muster-rolls, which shall accompany the said pay abstracts. That he shall certify accurately, to the commanding officer, the sums due to the respective corps, which shall have been examined as aforesaid, who shall thereon issue his warrant on the said Deputy Paymaster for the payment accordingly. That copies of all reports to the commanding officer, and the warrants thereon, shall be duly transmitted to the office of the accountant of the War Department, in order to be there examined and finally adjusted at the Treasury. That the said Paymaster shall give bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, with two sufficient sureties, for the faithful discharge of his duty, and he shall take an oath faithfully to execute the duties of his office. That the compensation to the said Paymaster shall be sixty dollars monthly, with the same rations and forage as a Major.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no assignment of pay, made after the first day of June next, by a non-commissioned officer or private, shall be valid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all purchases and contracts for supplying the Army with provisions, clothing, supplies in the Quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the Department of War, be made by or under the direction of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the superintendence of the collection of the duties on import and tonnage as he shall judge best. That the present office of assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury be abolished, and that instead thereof there be an officer in the Department of the Treasury, to be denominated Commissioner of the Revenue, who shall be charged with superintending, under the direction of the Head of the Department, the collection of the other revenues of the United States, and shall execute such other services, being conformable to the constitution of the Department, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury. That the compensation of the said Commissioner shall be a salary of one thousand nine hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in every case of an account or claim not finally adjusted, upon which the present Comptroller of the Treasury, as Auditor, may have decided, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the Revenue, and of the Auditor of the Treasury, finally to adjust the same; and in case of disagreement between the said Commissioner and Auditor, the decision of the Attorney General shall be final.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the death, absence from the Seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts whatsoever, shall be prescribed by the Department of the Treasury.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the compensations allowed to the Comptroller, Auditor, Treasurer, and Register of the Treasury, by the "Act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, their assistants and clerks," and to the Attorney General, by the "Act for allowing certain compensations to the Judges of the Supreme and other Courts, and to the Attorney General of the United States," the said officers respectively shall be allowed the following yearly sums, viz: the Comptroller four hundred dollars; the Auditor four hundred dollars; the Treasurer four hundred dollars; the Register five hundred dollars; the Attorney General four hundred dollars.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to have two principal clerks, each of whom to have a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum; and that the salary of the chief clerk of the Department of War be at the rate of eight hundred dollars per year.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the restriction on the clerks of the Department of the Treasury, so far as respects the carrying on of any trade or business, other than in the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or any kind of public property, be abolished, and that such restriction, so far as respects the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or any public property of either, be extended to the Commissioner of the Revenue, to the several Commissioners of Loans, and to all persons employed in their respective offices, and to all officers of the United States concerned in the collection or disbursement prescribed in the eighth section of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," and the provisions relative to the officers in the Treasury Department, contained in the "Act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads," shall be, and hereby are, extended and applied to the Commissioner of the Revenue.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act making certain appropriations therein specified.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be granted and appropriated the following sums for the following purposes, to wit: For the discharge of a balance to the Commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of the fifteenth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, two thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-eight cents; for additional salary to the first clerk of the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; for defraying the expense of stating and printing certain public accounts, pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the thirtieth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, eight hundred dollars; for discharging the accounts of officers of the Courts of the United States, jurors, and witnesses, in aid of the fund heretofore appropriated, seventeen thousand dollars; for making good deficiencies in former appropriations, for defraying the expense of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, four thousand six hundred and ninety-five dollars and fifty-nine cents; for discharging certain accounts against the Treasury Department, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, including a sum of six hundred dollars for furnishing the supervisors of the revenue with screw presses, seals, and other articles, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and sixty-one cents; for a balance due to Lieutenant John Freeman, of the late Maryland line, on account of subsistence for the years one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, and one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, forty-one dollars and seventy-five cents; for compensation to the clerks of the acting Commissioners of Army accounts, and contingencies of his office, one thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars and sixteen cents; for additional compensation to the Doorkeepers of the House of Representatives, pursuant to a resolution of the House of the twenty-fourth of March last, seven hundred dollars; for the discharge of such demands against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which are of a nature, according to the usage thereof, to require payment in specie, five thousand dollars. All which said sums, amounting together to thirty-four thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and ninety cents, shall and may be paid out of the funds following, any or all of them, namely: the surpluses which may remain of appropriations heretofore made, after satisfying the purposes of such appropriations; moneys which have been paid into the Treasury in consequence of balances which have been found due from individuals, relating to transactions prior to the present Government of the United States; the surplus, not heretofore appropriated, of the duties on imports and tonnage, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the aforesaid surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, as may be necessary, shall be and is hereby appropriated, in addition to the provision heretofore made, towards defraying the expenses which shall have been incurred in the execution of the act for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making farther provision for the protection of the frontiers, within the limits of the sum of three hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars and twenty cents thereby authorized; and towards reimbursing any sums which may have been borrowed, or advances of money which may have been obtained for that purpose.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That a sum of fifty thousand dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray any expense which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who, if necessary, is authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States the said sum of fifty thousand dollars; an account of the expenditure whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act to provide for a Copper coinage.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Director of the Mint, with the approbation of the President of the United States, be authorized to contract for and purchase a quantity of copper, not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons; and that the said Director, as soon as the needful preparations shall be made, cause the copper by him purchased to be coined at the Mint into cents and half cents, pursuant to the "Act establishing a Mint and regulating the Coins of the United States;" and that the said cents and half cents, as they shall be coined, be paid into the Treasury of the United States, thence to issue into circulation.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, after the expiration of six calendar months from the time when there shall have been paid into the Treasury by the said Director, in cents and half cents, a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, which time shall forthwith be announced by the Treasurer-in at least two gazettes or newspapers, published at the Seat of the Government of the United States for the time being, no copper coins or pieces whatsoever, except the said cents and half cents, shall pass current as money, or shall be paid, or offered to be paid, or received in payment for any debt, demand, claim, matter, or thing whatsoever; and all copper coins or pieces, except the said cents and half cents, which shall be paid or offered to be paid or received in payment contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, shall be forfeited; and every person by whom any of them shall have been so paid, or offered to be paid, or received in payment, shall also forfeit the sum of ten dollars; and the said forfeiture and penalty shall and may be recovered, with costs of suit, for the benefit of any person or persons by whom information of the incurring thereof shall have been given.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensation for the officers of the said Courts, and for jurors and witnesses.

Be it enacted, &c. That all writs and processes issuing from the Supreme or a Circuit Court, shall bear teste of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court (or if that office shall be vacant) of the Associate Justice next in precedence, and all writs and processes issuing from a District Court shall bear teste of the Judge of such Court (or if that office shall be vacant) of the clerk thereof, which said writs and processes shall be under the seal of the Court from whence they issue, and signed by the clerk thereof. The seals shall be provided at the expense of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the form of writs, executions, and other process, except their style and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits, in those of Common Law, shall be the same as are now used in the said Courts respectively, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act to regulate processes in the Courts of the United States;" in those of Equity and in those of Admiralty and Maritime jurisdiction, according to the principles, rules, and usages, which belong to Courts of Equity and to Courts of Admiralty respectively, as contra-distinguished from Courts of Common Law; except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said Courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper from time to time by rule to prescribe to any Circuit or District Court concerning the same: Provided, That, on judgments in any of the cases aforesaid, where different kinds of executions are issuable in succession, a capias ad satisfaciendum being one, the plaintiff shall have his election to take out a capias ad satisfaciendum in the first instance.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the fees and compensations to the several officers and other persons hereinafter mentioned, shall be as follows; that is to say: To the Marshals of the several districts of the United States, for the service of any writ, warrant, attachment, or process, in Chancery, on each person named in the same, two dollars; for his travel out in serving each writ, warrant, attachment, or process, aforesaid, five cents per mile, to be computed from the place of service to the Court where the writ or process shall be returned; and if more persons than one are named therein, the travel shall be computed from the Court to the place of service which is most remote, adding thereto the extra travel necessary to serve it on the other: Provided, That the fee for travel, where there is one person named in such writ, warrant, attachment, or process, shall in no case exceed seven dollars; and when there are more than one the fee for extra travel shall not exceed one dollar above seven dollars for each person. For each bail-bond, fifty cents; for selling goods and vessels condemned, and receiving and paying the money, three per cent; for every commitment or discharge of a prisoner, fifty cents; for summoning witnesses, where he does it, each, thirty cents; for summoning a grand or petit jury, each, three dollars: Provided, That in those States where jurors, by the laws of the State, are drawn by constables or other officers of corporate towns or places by lot, the Marshals shall receive for the use of such constables or officers the fees allowed for summoning jurors; for attending the Supreme, Circuit, or District Courts, five dollars per day, and at the rate of ten cents per mile for his expenses and time in traveling from the place of his abode to either of the said Courts; for levying an execution, and for all other services, not herein enumerated, such fees or compensation as are allowed in the Supreme Court of the State where the services shall be rendered. To the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, ten dollars per day for his attendance in Court, and for his other services in discharging the duties of his office, double the fees of the clerk of the Supreme Court of that State in which the Supreme Court of the United States shall be holden. To the clerk of the District and Circuit Courts such fees in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same; and five dollars per day for his attendance on any Circuit or District Court, and at the rate of ten cents per mile for his expenses and time in traveling from the place of his abode to either of the said Courts. And in case any clerk of a Court of the United States shall, in discharging the duties of his office, perform any kind of service which is not performed by the clerks of the Courts of the State, and for which the laws of the State make no allowance, the Court in which such service shall be rendered may allow a reasonable compensation therefor. To each grand and petit juror, fifty cents per day for attending in Court, and for traveling at the rate of five cents per every mile from their respective places of abode to the place where the Court is held, and the like allowance for returning. To witnesses summoned in any of the Courts of the United States the same compensations in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same. To the Attorney of the United States for the District, such fees in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same, and also the like compensation for traveling as is above allowed to the clerk of the District and Circuit Courts.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Marshal shall have the custody of all vessels and goods seized by any officer of the revenue, and shall be allowed such compensation therefor as the Court may judge reasonable. And there shall be paid to the Marshal the amount of the expense for fuel, candles, and other reasonable contingencies, that may accrue in holding the Courts within his District, and providing the books necessary to record the proceedings thereof; and such amount, as also the compensations aforesaid, to the grand and petit jurors, to the witnesses summoned on the part of the United States, to the clerk of the Supreme Court for his attendance; to the clerks of the District and Circuit Courts for their traveling and attendance; to the Attorney of the District for traveling to Court; to the Marshal for his attendance at Court; for summoning grand and petit jurors and witnesses in behalf of any prisoner to be tried for a capital offence; for the maintenance of prisoners confined in jail for any criminal offence, and for the commitment or discharge of such prisoner, and also the legal fees of the Clerk, Attorney, and Marshal, in criminal prosecutions, shall be included in the account of the Marshal; and the same having been examined and certified by the Court, or one of the Judges of it, in which the service shall have been rendered, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, to the Marshal, and by him shall be paid over to the persons entitled to the same, and the Marshal shall be allowed two and a-half per cent. on the amount by him so paid over, to be charged in his future account.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in every prosecution for any fine or forfeiture incurred under any statutes of the United States, if judgment is rendered against the defendant he shall be subject to the payment of costs; and on every conviction for any other offence, not capital, the Court may, in their discretion, award that the defendant shall pay the costs of prosecution. And if any former or plaintiff, on a penal statute, to whose benefit the penalty, or any part thereof, if recovered is directed by law to accrue, shall discontinue his suit or prosecution, or shall be non-suit in the same, or if, upon trial, a verdict shall pass for the defendant, the Court shall award to the defendant his costs, unless such informer or plaintiff be an officer of the United States, specially authorized to commence such prosecution, and the Court before whom the action or information shall be tried, shall, at the trial in open Court, certify, upon record, that there was reasonable cause for commencing the same, in which case no costs shall be adjudged to the defendant.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the fees and compensations to the several officers and persons herein before mentioned, other than those which are above directed to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be recovered in like manner as the fees of the officers of the States respectively for like services are recovered.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, if any officer herein before mentioned, or his deputy, shall, by reason or color of his office, wilfully and corruptly demand and receive any greater fees than those allowed by this act, he shall, on conviction thereof in any Court of the United States, forfeit and pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the Court before whom the conviction shall be.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to continue in force for a limited time, an act passed at the first session of Congress, entitled 'An act to regulate processes in the Courts of the United States,'" and also another act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act providing compensations for the officers of the Judicial Courts of the United States and for jurors and witnesses and for other purposes," be and the same are hereby repealed.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States forthwith to transmit to the clerks of the several Circuit Courts the form of a writ of error, to be approved by any two of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and it shall be lawful for the clerks of the said Circuit Courts to issue writs of error agreeably to such forms as nearly as the case may admit, under the seal of the said Circuit Courts, returnable to the Supreme Court, in the same manner as the clerk of the Supreme Court may issue such writs, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States."

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the clerks of the District and Circuit Courts, in the absence, or in case of the disability, of the Judges, to take recognizances of special bail, de bene esse, in any action depending in either of the said Courts, and also the affidavits of all surveyors relative to their reports, and to administer oaths to all persons identifying papers found on board of vessels or elsewhere, to be used on trials in Admiralty causes.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That, in all suits and actions in any District Court of the United States, in which it shall appear that the Judge of such Court is, any ways, concerned in interest, or has been of counsel, for either party, it shall be the duty of such Judge, on application on the minutes party, to cause the fact to be entered on the minutes of the Court, and also to order an authenticated copy thereof, with all the proceedings in such suit or action, to be forthwith certified to the next Circuit Court of the District, which Circuit Court shall, thereupon, take cognizance thereof, in the like manner, as if it had been originally commenced in that Court, and shall proceed to hear and determine the same accordingly.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all the records and proceedings of the Court of Appeals heretofore appointed, previous to the adoption in the present Constitution, shall be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, who is hereby authorized and directed to give copies of all such records and proceedings, to any person requiring and paying for the same, in like manner as copies of the records and other proceedings of the said Court are by law directed to be given: which copies shall have like faith and credit as all other proceedings of the said Court.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An act more effectually to provide for the National Defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That each and every free able-bodied white male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years, (except as hereinafter excepted) shall severally, and respectively, be enrolled in the Militia by the Captain or commanding officer of the company, within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and that within twelve months after the passing of this act. And it shall at all times hereafter be the duty of every such Captain or commanding officer of a company, to enrol every such citizen, as aforesaid, and also those who shall, from time to time, arrive at the age of eighteen years, or being of the age of eighteen years and under the age of forty-five years (except as before excepted) shall come to reside within his bounds: and shall without delay notify such citizen of the said enrolment, by a proper non-commissioned officer of the company, by whom such notice may be proved. That every citizen, so enrolled and notified, shall, within six months thereafter, provide himself with a good musket or firelock, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, and a knapsack, a pouch with a box therein to contain not less than twenty-four cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball; or with a good rifle, knapsack, shot-pouch and powder-horn, twenty balls suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder; and shall appear, so armed, accoutred, and provided, when called out to exercise or into service, except that when called out on company days to exercise only, he may appear without a knapsack. That the commissioned officers shall severally be armed with a sword or hanger, and espartoon; and that, from and after five years from the passing of this act, all muskets for arming the Militia as is herein required, shall be of bores sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound; and every citizen so enrolled, and providing himself with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, required as aforesaid, shall hold the same exempted from all suits, distresses, executions, or sales for debt, or for the payment of taxes.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Vice President of the United States; the officers, Judicial and Executive, of the Government of the United States; the members of both Houses of Congress, and their respective officers; all custom-house officers, with their clerks; all post-officers, and stage-drivers, who are employed in the care and conveyance of the mail of the Post Office of the United States; all ferry-men employed at any ports; all pilots; all mariners actually employed in the sea-service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; and all persons who now are or may hereafter be exempted by the laws of the respective States, shall be, and are hereby exempted from Militia duty, notwithstanding their being above the age of eighteen, and under the age of forty-five years.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, within one year after the passing of this act, the Militia of the respective States shall be arranged into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, as the Legislature of each State shall direct; and each division, brigade, and regiment, shall be numbered at the formation thereof; and a record made of such numbers in the Adjutant General's office in the State; and when in the field, or in service in the State, each division, brigade, and regiment shall, respectively, take rank according to their numbers, reckoning the first or lowest number highest in rank. That if the same be convenient, each brigade shall consist of four regiments; each regiment of two battalions; each battalion of five companies; each company of sixty-four privates. That the said Militia shall be officered by the respective States, as follows: To each division, one Major General and two Aides-de-Camp, with the rank of Major; to each brigade, one Brigadier General with one Brigade Inspector, to serve also as Brigade Major, with the rank of a Major; to each regiment, one Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant; and to each battalion, one Major; to each company, one Captain, one Lieutenant, one Ensign, four Sergeants, four Corporals, one Drummer, and one Fifer or Bugler. That there shall be a regimental staff, to consist of one Adjutant, and one Quartermaster, to rank as Lieutenants; one Paymaster; one Surgeon, and one Surgeon's-Mate; one Sergeant-Major; one Drum-Major, and one Fife-Major.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That out of the Militia enrolled, as is herein directed, there shall be formed for each battalion, at least one company of grenadiers, light infantry, or riflemen; and that to each division there shall be, at least, one company of artillery, and one troop of horse. There shall be to each company of artillery, one Captain, two Lieutenants, four Sergeants, four Corporals, six Gunners, six Bombardiers, one Drummer, and one Fifer. The officers to be armed with a sword or hanger, a fusée, bayonet and belt, with a cartridge box to contain twelve cartridges; and each private or matross shall furnish himself with all the equipments of a private in the infantry, until proper ordnance and field artillery is provided. There shall be to each troop of horse, one Captain, two Lieutenants, one Cornet, four Sergeants, four Corporals, one Sadler, one Farrier, and one Trumpeter. The commissioned officers to furnish themselves with good horses of, at least fourteen hands and an half high, and to be armed with a sword and pair of pistols, the holsters of which to be covered with bearskin caps. Each dragoon to furnish himself with a serviceable horse, at least fourteen hands and an half high, a good saddle, bridle, mail-pillion, and valise, holsters, and a breast-plate and crupper, a pair of boots and spurs, a pair of pistols, a sabre, and cartridge box to contain twelve cartridges for pistols. That each company of volunteers from the brigade, at the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief of the State, not exceeding one company each to a regiment, nor more in number than one-eleventh part of the infantry, and shall be uniformly clothed in regimentals, to be furnished at their own expense; the color and fashion to be determined by the Brigadier commanding the brigade to which they belong.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That each battalion and regiment shall be provided with the State and regimental colors by the field officers, and each company with a drum and fife or bugle horn, by the commissioned officers of the company, in such manner as the Legislature of the company, or the States shall direct.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an Adjutant General appointed in each State, whose duty it shall be to distribute all orders from the Commander-in-Chief of the State to the several corps; to attend all public reviews, when the Commander-in-Chief of the State shall review the Militia, or any part thereof; to obey all orders from him relative to carrying into execution and perfecting the system of military discipline established by this act; to furnish blank-forms of different returns that may be required, and to explain the principles on which they should be made; to receive from the several officers of the different corps throughout the State, returns of the Militia under their command, reporting the actual situation of their arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, their delinquencies, and every other thing which relates to the general advancement of good order and discipline. All which, the several officers of the divisions, brigades, regiments, and battalions, are hereby required to make in the usual manner, so that the said Adjutant General may be duly furnished therewith. From all which returns he shall make proper abstracts, and lay the same annually before the Commander-in-Chief of the State.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the rules of discipline approved and established by Congress, in their resolution of the twenty-ninth of March, 1779, shall be the rules of discipline to be observed by the Militia throughout the United States, except such deviations from the said rules, as may be rendered necessary by the requisitions of this act, or by some other unavoidable circumstances. It shall be the duty of the commanding officer at every muster, whether by battalion, regiment, or single company, to cause the Militia to be exercised and and trained agreeably to the said rules of discipline.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all commissioned officers shall take rank according to the date of their commissions; and when two of the same grade bear an equal date, then their rank to be determined by lot, to be drawn by them before the commanding officer of the brigade, regiment, battalion, company, or detachment.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person, whether officer or soldier, belonging to the Militia of any State, and called out into the service of the United States, be wounded or disabled while in actual service, he shall be taken care of and provided for at the public expense.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Brigade Inspector to attend the regimental and battalion meetings of the Militia composing their several brigades, during the time of their being under arms, to inspect their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements; superintend their exercise and manœuvres, and introduce the system of military discipline before described throughout the brigade, agreeably to law, and such orders as they shall, from time to time, receive from the Commander-in-Chief of the State; to make returns to the Adjutant General of the State, at least once in every year, of the Militia of the brigade to which he belongs, reporting therein the actual situation of the arms, accoutrements, and ammunition of the several corps, and every other thing which, in his judgment, may relate to their government and the general advancement of good order and military discipline; and the Adjutant General shall make a return of all the Militia of the State, to the Commander-in-Chief of the said State, and a duplicate of the same to the President of the United States.

And whereas sundry corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, now exist in several of the said States, which, by the laws, customs, or usages thereof, have not been incorporated with or subject to the general regulations of the Militia—

Sec. 11. Be it further enacted, That such corps retain their accustomed privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by this act, in like manner with the other Militia.

An Act respecting the Government of the Territories of the United States Northwest and South of the River Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That the laws of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio that have been or hereafter may be enacted by the Governor and Judges thereof, shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of State, and two hundred copies thereof, together with ten sets of the laws of the United States, shall be delivered to the said Governor and Judges, to be distributed among the inhabitants, for their information; and that a like number of the laws of the United States shall be delivered to the Governor and Judges of the Territory Southwest of the river Ohio.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor and Judges of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio shall be, and hereby are, authorized to repeal their laws by them made, whensoever the same may be found to be improper.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the official duties of the Secretaries of the said Territories shall be under the control of such laws, as are or may be in force in the said Territories.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any one of the Supreme or Superior Judges of the said Territories, in the absence of the other Judges, shall be and hereby is authorized to hold a Court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State provide proper seals for the several and respective public offices in the said Territories.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the limitation act, passed by the Governor and Judges of the said Territory, the twenty-eighth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, be and hereby is disapproved.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the expenses incurred by John Cleves Symmes and George Turner, two of the Judges of the said Territory, in sending an express, and in purchasing a boat to go the Circuit, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, shall be liquidated by the officers of the Treasury, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be provided, for the use of the several collectors in the United States, printed clearances, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the methods which have been found to answer for obtaining fresh, from salt water, and of constructing extempore stills, of such implements as are generally on board of every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases, where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette, on their return to the United States, or to communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements, or new ideas, which may occur to them in practice.

PUBLIC ACTS OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS.

An Act concerning the Registering and Recording of Ships or Vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That ships or vessels which shall have been registered by virtue of the act, entitled "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting-trade, and for other purposes," and those which, after the last day of March next, shall be registered pursuant to this act, and no other, (except such as shall be duly qualified according to law for carrying on the coasting-trade and fisheries, or one of them,) shall be denominated and deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such ships or vessels: Provided, That they shall not continue to enjoy the same longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned and to be commanded by a citizen or citizens of the said States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That ships or vessels built within the United States, whether before or after the fourth of July, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens thereof, or not built within the said States, but on the sixteenth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, belonging, and thenceforth continuing to belong, to a citizen or citizens thereof, and ships or vessels which may hereafter be captured in war by such citizen or citizens, and lawfully condemned as prize, or which have been or may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States, being wholly owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, and no other, may be registered as hereinafter directed: Provided, That no such ship or vessel shall be entitled to be so registered, or, if registered, to the benefits thereof, if owned in whole or in part by any citizen of the United States who usually resides in a foreign country, during the continuance of such residence, unless such citizen be in the capacity of a Consul of the United States, or an agent for, and a partner in, some house of trade or co-partnership, consisting of citizens of the said States, actually carrying on trade within the said States: And provided, further, That no ship or vessel built within the United States prior to the said sixteenth day of May, which was not then owned wholly or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be capable of being registered, by virtue of any transfer to a citizen or citizens which may hereafter be made, unless by way of prize or forfeiture: Provided, nevertheless, That this shall not be construed to prevent the registering anew of any ship or vessel which was before registered pursuant to the act before mentioned.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel hereafter to be registered, (except as is hereinafter provided,) shall be registered by the collector of the district in which shall be comprehended the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong at the time of her registry, which port shall be deemed to be that at or nearest to which the owner, if there be but one, or, if more than one, the husband or acting and managing owner of such ship or vessel usually resides; and the name of the said ship or vessel, and of the port to which she shall so belong, shall be painted on her stern, on a black ground, in white letters, of not less than three inches in length; and if any ship or vessel of the United States shall be found without having her name and the name of the port to which she belongs painted in manner aforesaid, the owner or owners shall forfeit fifty dollars, one-half to the person giving the information thereof, the other half to the use of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in order to the registry of any ship or vessel, an oath or affirmation shall be taken and subscribed by the owner, or by one of the owners thereof, before the officer authorized to make such registry, who is hereby empowered to administer the same, declaring, according to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so swearing or affirming, the name of such ship or vessel, her burden, the place where she was built, if built within the United States, and the year in which she was built, and, if built within the United States before the said sixteenth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, that she was then owned, wholly or in part, by a citizen or citizens of the United States; and, if not built within the said States, that she was, on the said sixteenth day of May, and ever since hath continued to be, the entire property of a citizen or citizens of the United States; or that she was, at some time posterior to the time when this act shall take effect, [specifying the said time,] captured in war by a citizen or citizens of the said States, and lawfully condemned as prize, [producing a copy of the sentence of condemnation, authenticated in the usual forms,] or that she has been adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States, [producing a like copy of the sentence whereby she shall have been so adjudged,] and declaring his or her name and place of abode, and, if he or she be the sole owner of the said ship or vessel, that such is the case; or, if there be another owner or other owners, that there is or are such other owner or owners, specifying his, her, or their name or names, and place or places of abode, and that he, she, or they, as the case may be, so swearing or affirming, is or are citizens of the United States; and, where an owner resides in a foreign country, in the capacity of a Consul of the United States, or as an agent for, and a partner in, a house or co-partnership, consisting of citizens of the United States, and actually carrying on trade within the United States, that such is the case, and that there is no subject or citizen of any foreign Prince or

State, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, interested in such ship or vessel, or in the profits or issues thereof, and that the master or commander thereof is a citizen, naming the said master or commander, and stating the means whereby, or manner in which he is so a citizen; and, in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall be within the district aforesaid when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall himself make oath or affirmation, instead of the said owner, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master or person having the said charge or command shall so swear or affirm shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall himself forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars: And provided further, That, in the case of a ship or vessel, built within the United States prior to the sixteenth day of May aforesaid, which was not then owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, but which, by virtue of a transfer to such citizen or citizens, shall have been registered pursuant to the act before mentioned, the oath or affirmation hereby required shall and may be varied, according to the truth of the case, as often as it shall be requisite to grant a new register for such ship or vessel.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every owner, resident within the United States, of any ship or vessel to which a certificate of registry may be granted (in case there be more than one such owner) to transmit to the collector who may have granted the same a like oath or affirmation with that hereinbefore directed to be taken and subscribed by the owner, on whose application such certificate shall have been granted, and within ninety days after the same may have been so granted; which oath or affirmation may, at the option of the party, be taken and subscribed, either before the said collector, or before the collector of some other district, or a Judge of the Supreme or a District Court of the United States, or of a Superior Court of original jurisdiction of some one of the States; and if such oath or affirmation shall not be taken, subscribed, and transmitted, as is herein required, the certificate of registry granted to such ship or vessel shall be forfeit and void.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, before any ship or vessel shall be registered, she shall be measured by a surveyor, if there be one, or by the person he shall appoint, at the port or place where the said ship or vessel may be, and, if there be none, by such person as the collector of the district within which she may be shall appoint, according to the rule prescribed by the forty-third section of the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and the officer or person by whom such admeasurement shall be made shall, for the information of, and as a voucher to, the officer by whom the registry is to be made, grant a certificate, specifying the build of such ship or vessel, her number of decks and masts, her length, breadth, depth, the number of tons she measures, and such other particulars as are usually descriptive of the identity of a ship or vessel; and that her name and the place to which she belongs are painted on her stern, in manner required by the third section of this act; which certificate shall be countersigned by an owner, or by the master of such ship or vessel, or by some other person who shall attend her admeasurement, on behalf of her owner or owners, in testimony of the truth of the particulars therein contained; without which the said certificate shall not be valid; but, in all cases where a ship or vessel has before been registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, it shall not be necessary to measure her anew for the purpose of obtaining another register, except such ship or vessel shall have undergone some alteration, as to her burden, subsequent to the time of her former registry.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, previous to the registry of any ship or vessel, the husband or acting and managing owner, together with the master thereof, and one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector of the district, whose duty it is to make such registry, shall become bound to the United States, if such ship or vessel shall be of burden not exceeding fifty tons, in the sum of four hundred dollars; if of burden above fifty tons, and not exceeding one hundred, in the sum of eight hundred dollars; if of burden above one hundred tons, and not exceeding two hundred, in the sum of twelve hundred dollars; if of burden above two hundred tons, and not exceeding three hundred, in the sum of sixteen hundred dollars; and if of burden exceeding three hundred tons, in the sum of two thousand dollars; with condition, in each case, that the certificate of such registry shall be solely used for the ship or vessel for which it is granted, and shall not be sold, lent, or otherwise disposed of, to any person or persons whomsoever; and that in case such ship or vessel shall be lost, or taken by an enemy, burnt, or broken up, or shall be otherwise prevented from returning to the port to which she may belong, the said certificate, if preserved, shall be delivered up within eight days after the arrival of the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, within any district of the United States, to the collector of such district: and that if any foreigner, or any person or persons, for the use and benefit of such foreigner, shall purchase, or otherwise become entitled to, the whole, or any part or share of, or interest in, such ship or vessel, the same being within a district of the United States, the said certificate shall, in such case, within seven days after such purchase, change, or transfer of property, be delivered up to the collector of the said district; and that if any such purchase, change, or transfer of property, shall happen when such ship or vessel shall be at any foreign port or place, or at sea, then the said master, or person having the charge or command thereof, shall, within eight days after his arrival within any district of the United States, deliver up the said certificate to the collector of such district; and every such certificate, so delivered up, shall be forthwith transmitted to the Register of the Treasury, to be cancelled, who, if the same shall have been delivered up to a collector other than of the district in which it was granted, shall cause notice of such delivery to be given to the collector of the said district.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in order to the registry of any ship or vessel which, after the last day of March next, shall be built within the United States, it shall be necessary to produce a certificate, under the hand of the principal or master-carpenter, by whom or under whose direction the said ship or vessel shall have been built, testifying that she was built by him, or under his direction, and specifying the place where, the time when, and the person or persons for whom, and describing her build, number of decks and masts, length, breadth, depth, tonnage, and such other circumstances as are usually descriptive of the identity of a ship or vessel; which certificate shall be sufficient to authorize the removal of a new vessel from the district where she may be built to another district, in the same or an adjoining State, where the owner or owners actually reside, provided it be with ballast only.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the several matters herein before required having been complied with, in order to the registering of any ship or vessel, the collector of the district comprehending the port to which she shall belong, shall make and keep, in some proper book, a record or registry thereof, and shall grant an abstract or certificate of such record or registry, as nearly as may be, in the form following:

"In pursuance of an act of the Congress of the United States of America, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels,' [inserting here the name, occupation, and place of abode of the person by whom the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall have been made,] having taken or subscribed the oath (or affirmation) required by the said act, and if more than one owner, adding the words "together with," and the name or names, occupation or occupations, place or places of abode, of the other owner or owners) is (or are) the only owner (or owners) of the ship or vessel called the [inserting here her name] of [inserting here the port to which she may belong] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, and is a citizen of the United States, and that the said ship or vessel was [inserting here when and where built] and [inserting here the name and office, if any, of the person by whom she shall have been surveyed or admeasured] having certified that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here the number of decks] and [inserting here the number of masts] and that her length is [inserting here the number of feet] her breadth [inserting here the number of feet] her depth [inserting here the number of feet] and that she measures [inserting here her number of tons] that she is [describing here the particular kind of vessel, whether ship, brigantine, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else, together with her build, and specifying whether she has any, or no gallery or head] and the said [naming the owner, or the master, or other person acting in behalf of the owner or owners, by whom the certificate of admeasurement shall have been countersigned as aforesaid] having agreed to the description and admeasurement above specified, and sufficient security having been given, according to the said act, the said ship or vessel has been duly registered at the port of [naming the port where registered.] Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said port] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year [specifying the number of the year in words at length:] Provided, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall, himself, have made oath or affirmation touching his being a citizen, the wording of the said certificate shall be varied so as to be conformable to the truth of the case: And provided, That where a new certificate of registry is granted, in consequence of any transfer of a ship or vessel, the words shall be so varied as to refer to the former certificate of registry, for her admeasurement.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared and transmitted, from time to time, to the collectors of the several districts, a sufficient number of forms of the said certificates of registry, attested under the seal of the Treasury and the hand of the Register thereof, with proper blanks, to be filled by the said collectors, respectively, by whom also the said certificates shall be signed and sealed before they shall be issued; and where there is a naval officer at any port, they shall be countersigned by him; and where there is a surveyor, but no naval officer, they shall be countersigned by him; and a copy of each shall be transmitted to the said Register, who shall cause a record to be kept of the same.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That where any citizen or citizens of the United States shall purchase, or become owner or owners of any ship or vessel entitled to be registered by virtue of this act, such ship or vessel, being within any district other than the one in which he or they usually reside, such ship or vessel shall be entitled to be registered by the collector of the district where such ship or vessel may be at the time of his or their becoming owner or owners thereof, upon his or their complying with the provisions herein before prescribed, in order to the registry of ships or vessels: And the oath or affirmation which is required to be taken may, at the option of such owner or owners, be taken either before the collector of the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel may belong, or before the collector of the district within which such ship or vessel may be, either of whom is hereby empowered to administer the same: Provided, nevertheless, That whenever such ship or vessel shall arrive within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong, the certificate of registry, which shall have been obtained as aforesaid, shall be delivered up to the collector of such district, who, upon the requisites of this act in order to the registry of ships or vessels being complied with, shall grant a new one in lieu of the first; and the certificate so delivered up shall forthwith be returned by the collector who shall have granted it; and if the said first mentioned certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as above directed, the owner or owners, and the master of such ship or vessel, at the time of her said arrival within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel may belong, shall, severally, forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit; and the said certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void. And in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall be within the district aforesaid when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall, himself, make oath or affirmation, instead of the said owner, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master or person having the said charge or command shall so swear or affirm shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall, himself, forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That when any ship or vessel, entitled to be registered, pursuant to this act, shall be purchased by an agent or attorney for, or on account of a citizen or citizens of the United States, such ship or vessel, being in a district of the United States more than fifty miles distant, taking the nearest usual route by land, from the one comprehending the port to which, by virtue of such purchase, and by force of this act, such ship or vessel ought to be deemed to belong, it shall be lawful for the collector of the district, where such ship or vessel may be, and he is hereby required, upon the application of such agent or attorney, to proceed to the registering of the said ship or vessel, the said agent or attorney first complying, on behalf, and in the stead of, the owner or owners thereof, with the requisites prescribed by this act in order to the registry of ships or vessels, except, that in the oath or affirmation, which shall be taken by the said agent or attorney, instead of swearing or affirming that he is owner, or an owner of such ship or vessel, he shall swear or affirm that he is agent or attorney for the owner or owners thereof, and that he hath bona fide purchased the said ship or vessel for the person or persons whom he shall name and describe as the owner or owners thereof: Provided, nevertheless, That whenever such ship or vessel shall arrive within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong, the certificate of registry, which shall have been obtained as aforesaid, shall be delivered up to the collector of such district, who, upon the requisites of this act, in order to the registry of ships or vessels, being complied with, shall grant a new one, in lieu of the first; and the certificate, so delivered up, shall forthwith be returned by the collector, who shall transmit the same to the collector who shall have granted it. And if the said first mentioned certificate of registry shall not be delivered up, as above directed, the owner or owners, and the master of such ship or vessel, at the time of her said arrival within the district comprehending the port to which she may belong, shall, severally, forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit, and the said certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void. And in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master, or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall be within the district aforesaid, when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall himself make oath or affirmation, instead of the said agent or attorney, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master, or person having the said charge or command, shall so swear or affirm, shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall, himself, forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the certificate of the registry of any ship or vessel shall be lost or destroyed, or mislaid, the master, or other person having the charge or command thereof, may make oath or affirmation, before the collector of the district where such ship or vessel shall first be after such loss, destruction, or mislaid, who is hereby authorized to administer the same, which oath or affirmation shall be of the form following: "I [inserting here the name of the person swearing or affirming] being master [or having the charge or command] of the ship [or vessel, called the [inserting the name of the vessel]] do swear (or affirm) that the said ship or vessel hath been, as I verily believe, registered, according to law, by the name of [inserting again the name of the vessel] and that a certificate thereof was granted by the collector of the district of [naming the district where registered] which certificate has been lost [or destroyed, or unintentionally and by mere accident mislaid, as the case may be] and [except where the certificate is alleged to have been destroyed] that the same, if found again, and within my power, shall be delivered up to the collector of the district in which it was granted." Which oath or affirmation shall be subscribed by the party making the same: and upon such oath or affirmation being made, and the other requisites of this act, in order to the registry of ships or vessels, being complied with, it shall be lawful for the collector of the district, before whom such oath or affirmation is made, to grant a new register, inserting therein, that the same is issued in the room of the one lost or destroyed. But in all cases where a register shall be granted, in lieu of the one lost or destroyed, by any other than the collector of the district to which the ship or vessel actually belongs, such register shall, within ten days after her first arrival within the district to which she belongs, be delivered up to the collector of the said district, who shall, thereupon, grant a new register, in lieu thereof. And in case the master or commander shall neglect to deliver up such register, within the time aforesaid, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars; and the former register shall become null and void.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That when any ship or vessel, which shall have been registered pursuant to this act, or the act hereby in part repealed, shall, in whole or in part, be sold or transferred to a citizen or citizens of the United States, or shall be altered in form or burden, by being lengthened or built upon, or from one denomination to another, by the mode or method of rigging or fitting, in every such case the said ship or vessel shall be registered anew, by her former name, according to the directions herein before contained, (otherwise she shall cease to be deemed a ship or vessel of the United States,) and her former certificate of registry shall be delivered up to the collector to whom application for such new registry shall be made, at the time that the same shall be made, to be by him transmitted to the Register of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be cancelled. And in every such case of sale or transfer, there shall be some instrument of writing, in the nature of a bill of sale, which shall recite, at length, the said certificate, otherwise the said ship or vessel shall be incapable of being so registered anew. And in every case in which a ship or vessel is hereby required to be registered anew, if she shall not be so registered anew, she shall not be entitled to any of the privileges or benefits of a ship or vessel of the United States; and further, if her said former certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as aforesaid, except where the same may have been destroyed, lost, or unintentionally mislaid, and an oath or affirmation thereof shall have been made as aforesaid, the owner or owners of such ship or vessel shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That when the master or person having the charge or command of a ship or vessel, registered pursuant to this act, or the act hereby in part repealed, shall be changed, the owner or one of the owners, or the new master of such ship or vessel, shall report such change to the collector of the district where the same shall happen, or where the said ship or vessel shall first be, after the same shall have happened, and shall produce to him the certificate of registry of such ship or vessel, and shall make oath or affirmation, showing that such new master is a citizen of the United States, and the manner in which, or means whereby, he is so a citizen; whereupon the said collector shall endorse upon the said certificate of registry a memorandum of such change, specifying the name of such new master, and shall subscribe the said memorandum with his name, and if other than the collector of the district, by whom the said certificate of registry shall have been granted, shall transmit a copy of the said memorandum to him, with notice of the particular ship or vessel to which it shall relate; and the collector of the district, by whom the said certificate shall have been granted, shall make a like memorandum of such change, in his book of registers, and shall transmit a copy thereof to the Register of the Treasury. And if the said change shall not be reported, or if the said oath or affirmation shall not be taken, as above directed, the registry of such ship or vessel shall be void, and the said master, or person having the charge or command of her, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel, heretofore registered, or which shall hereafter be registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, shall be sold or transferred, in whole or in part, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, to a subject or citizen of any foreign Prince or State, and such sale or transfer shall not be made known in manner hereinbefore directed, such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited: Provided, That if such ship or vessel shall be owned in part only, and it shall be made appear to the jury before whom the trial for such forfeiture shall be had, that any other owner of such ship or vessel, being a citizen of the United States, was wholly ignorant of the sale or transfer to, or ownership of, such foreign subject or citizen, the share or interest of such citizen of the United States shall not be subject to such forfeiture; and the residue only shall be so forfeited.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That, upon the entry of every ship or vessel of the United States, from any foreign port or place, if the same shall be at the port or place at which the owner, or any of the part-owners reside, such owner or part-owner shall make oath or affirmation, that the register of such ship or vessel contains the name or names of all the persons who are then owners of the said ship or vessel; or if any part of such ship or vessel has been sold or transferred since the granting of such register, that such is the case, and that no foreign subject or citizen hath, to the best of his knowledge and belief, any share, by the way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, in such ship or vessel. And if the owner, or any part-owner, shall not reside at the port or place at which such ship or vessel shall enter, then the master or commander shall make oath or affirmation to the like effect. And if the owner, or part-owner, where there is one, or the master or commander, where there is no owner, shall refuse to swear or affirm as aforesaid, such ship or vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a ship or vessel of the United States.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the master, commander, or owner of a ship or vessel, shall deliver up the registers of such ship or vessel, agreeably to the provisions of this act, if to the collector of the district where the same shall have been granted, the said collector shall, thereupon, cancel the bond which shall have been given at the time of granting such register; or, if to the collector of any other district, such collector shall grant to the said master, commander, or owner, a receipt or acknowledgment, that such register has been delivered up to him, and the time when; and upon such receipt being produced to the collector by whom the register was granted, he shall cancel the bond of the party, as if the register had been returned to him.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the collector of each district shall progressively number the certificates of the registry by him granted, beginning anew at the commencement of each year, and shall enter an exact copy of each certificate in a book to be kept for that purpose; and shall, once in three months, transmit to the Register of the Treasury copies of all the certificates which shall have been granted by him, including the number of each.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel built in the United States after the fifteenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, in order to be entitled to the benefits of a ship built and recorded in the United States, shall be recorded in the office of the collector of the district in which such ship or vessel was built, in manner following, that is to say: The builder of every such ship or vessel shall make oath or affirmation before the collector of such district, who is hereby authorized to administer the same, in manner following: "I, [inserting here the name of such builder,] of [inserting here the place of his residence] shipwright, do swear (or affirm) that [describing here the kind of vessel, as, whether ship, brig, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else,] named [inserting here the name of the ship or vessel] having [inserting here the number of decks] and being in length [inserting here the number of feet,] in breadth, [inserting here the number of feet,] in depth, [inserting here the number of feet,] and measuring [inserting here the number of tons,] having [specifying whether any or no] gallery, and [also specifying whether any or no] head, was built by me or un-

Under my direction, at [naming the place, county, and State] in the United States, in the year [inserting here the number of the year.] Which oath or affirmation shall be subscribed by the person making the same, and shall be recorded in a book to be kept by the said collector for that purpose.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That the said collector shall cause the said ship or vessel to be surveyed or admeasured, according to the rule prescribed by the forty-third section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and the person by whom such admeasurement shall be made, shall grant a certificate thereof, as in the case of a ship or vessel to be registered; in which certificate shall be countersigned by the said builder, and by an owner, or the master, or person having the command or charge thereof, or by some other person, being an agent for the owner or owners thereof, in testimony of the truth of the particulars therein contained.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That a certificate of the said record, attested under the hand and seal of the said collector, shall be granted to the master of every such ship or vessel, as nearly as may be, of the form following: "In pursuance of an act, entitled 'An act concerning the recording of ships or vessels,' 1, [inserting here the name of the collector of the district,] of, [inserting here the name of the district,] in the United States, do hereby certify, that [inserting here the name of the builder of, [inserting here the place of his residence, county, and State,] having sworn (or affirmed) that the [describing the ship or vessel, as in the certificate of record,] named [inserting here her name] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, was built at [inserting here the name of the place, county, and State.

where built] by him, or under his direction, in the year, [inserting here the number of the year,] and [inserting here the name of the surveyor or other person by whom the same admeasurement shall have been made,] having certified that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here her number of decks,] is in length, [inserting here the number of feet,] in breadth, [inserting here the number of feet,] in depth, [inserting here the number of feet,] and measures [inserting here the number of tons,] and the said builder and [naming and describing the owner or master, or agent for the owner or owners, as the case may be, by whom the said certificate shall have been countersigned] having agreed to the said description and admeasurement, the said ship or vessel has been recorded, in the district of [inserting here the name of the district where recorded,] in the United States. Witness my hand and seal this [inserting here the day of the month,] day of [inserting here the name of the month,] in the year [inserting here the number of the year,] Which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the said collector, and a duplicate thereof transmitted to the Register of the Treasury of the United States, to be recorded in his office.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That if the master, or the name, of any ship or vessel so recorded shall be changed, the owner, part-owner, or consignee of such ship or vessel, shall cause a memorandum thereof to be endorsed on the certificate of the record, by the collector of the district, where such ship or vessel may be, or at which she shall first arrive, if such change took place in a foreign country; and a copy thereof shall be entered in the Book of Records, a transcript whereof shall be transmitted, by the said collector, to the collector of the district, where such certificate was granted, (if not the same person,) who shall enter the same in his Book of Records, and forward a duplicate of such entry, to the Register of the Treasury of the United States; and in such case, until the said owner, part-owner, or consignee, shall cause the said memorandum to be made by the collector, in manner aforesaid, such ship or vessel shall not be deemed, or considered, as a vessel recorded, in pursuance of this act.

Sec. 2A. And be it further enacted, That the master, or other person having the command or charge of any ship or vessel, recorded in pursuance of this act, shall, on entry of such ship or vessel, produce the certificate of such record, to the collector of the district, where she shall be so entered; in failure of which, the said ship or vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel, recorded as aforesaid: Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make it necessary to record, a second time, any ship or vessel, which shall have been recorded, pursuant to the act, hereby in part repealed; but such recording shall be of the like force and effect, as if made in pursuance to this act.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That the fees and allowances for the several services to be performed pursuant to this act, and the distribution of the same, shall be as follows, to wit: For the admeasurement of every ship or vessel, of one hundred tons and under, one cent per ton; for the admeasurement of every ship or vessel above one hundred, and not exceeding two hundred tons, one hundred and fifty cents; for the admeasurement of every ship or vessel, above two hundred tons, two hundred cents; for every certificate of registry or record, two hundred cents; for every endorsement upon a certificate of registry or record, one hundred cents; and for taking every bond required by this act, twenty-five cents. The whole amount of which fees shall be received, and accounted for by the collector, or, at his option, by the naval officer, where there is one; and where there is a collector, naval officer, and surveyor, shall be equally divided, monthly, between the said officers; and where there is no naval officer, two-thirds to the collector, and the other third to the surveyor; and where there is only a collector, he shall receive the whole amount thereof; and where there is more than one surveyor in any district, each of them shall receive his proportionable part of such fees, as shall arise in the port, for which he is appointed: Provided, always, That, in all cases, where the tonnage of any ship or vessel shall ties and forfeitures which may be incurred for offenses against the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law, on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," may legally be sued for, prosecuted, recovered, and disposed of: Provided, always, That, if any officer entitled to a part or share of any such penalty or forfeiture, shall be necessary, as a witness, on the trial for such penalty or forfeiture, such officer may be a witness upon the said trial, but in such case, he shall not receive, nor be entitled to any part or share of the said penalty or forfeiture; and the part or share, to which he would otherwise have been entitled, shall accrue to the United States.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of March next, this act shall be in full force and effect; and so much of the act, entitled "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes," as comes within the purview of this act, shall, after the said last day of March, be repealed.

Approved, December 31, 1792.

An act to amend an act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States," so far as respects the Coinage of Copper.

Be it enacted, &c., That every cent shall contain two hundred and eight grains of copper, and every half-cent shall contain one hundred and four grains of copper; and that so much of the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States," as respects the weight of cents and half-cents, shall be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Approved, January 14, 1793.

An Act to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress, of the twenty-eighth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, as an indemnity to the persons therein named.

Be it enacted, &c., That lawful interest, from the sixteenth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, shall be allowed on the sum of two hundred dollars, ordered to be paid to Return Jonathan Meigs, and the legal representative of Christopher Greene, deceased, by a resolve of the United States in Congress assembled, of the twenty-eighth day of September, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five.

Approved, January 14, 1793.

An Act to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the Means of Intercourse between the United States and Foreign Nations."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," which would expire at the end of the present session of Congress, be, and the same hereby is, together with this act, continued in force for the space of one year, from the passing of this act; and from thence, until the end of the session of Congress then, or next thereafter holden, and no longer.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases, where any sum or sums of money have issued, or shall hereafter issue, from the Treasury, for the purposes of intercourse or treaty, with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the accounting officers of the Treasury, in manner following, that is to say: by causing the same to be accounted for, specifically, in all instances, wherein the expenditure thereof may, in his judgment, be made public; and by making a certificate or certificates, or causing the Secretary of State to make a certificate or certificates of the amount of such expenditures, as he may think it advisable not to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum or sums therein expressed to have been expended.

Approved, February 9, 1793.

An Act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of July next, foreign gold and silver coins shall pass current as money within the United States, and be a legal tender for the payment of all debts and demands, at the several and respective rates following, and not otherwise, viz: The gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains of the actual weight thereof; the gold coins of France, Spain, and the dominions of Spain, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains and two-fifths of a grain of the actual weight thereof. Spanish milled dollars, at the rate of one hundred cents for each dollar, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than seventeen penny weights and seven grains; and in proportion for the parts of a dollar. Crowns of France, at the rate of one hundred and ten cents, for each crown, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than eighteen pennyweights and seventeen grains, and in proportion for the parts of a crown. But no foreign coin that may have been, or shall be issued subsequent to the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be a tender, as aforesaid, until samples thereof shall have been found, by assay, at the Mint of the United States, to be conformable to the respective standards required, and proclamation thereof shall have been made by the President of the United States.

Sec. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That at the expiration of three years next ensuing the time when the coinage of gold and silver, agreeably to the act, entitled, "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence at the Mint of the United States, (which time shall be announced by the proclamation of the President of the United States) all foreign gold coins, and all foreign silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars, shall cease to be a legal tender, as aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all foreign gold and silver coins, (except Spanish milled dollars, and parts of such dollars) which shall be received in payment for moneys due to the United States, after the said time, when the coinage of gold and silver coins shall begin at the Mint of the United States, shall, previously to their being issued in circulation, be coined anew, in conformity to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States."

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, the fifty-fifth section of the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," which ascertains the rates at which foreign gold and silver coins shall be received for the duties and fees to be collected in virtue of the said act, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assay provided to be made by the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence in the manner as by the said act is prescribed, on the second Monday of February annually, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, February 9, 1793.

An Act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted.

Be it enacted, &c., That all claims upon the United States for services or supplies, or for other cause, matter, or thing, furnished or done previous to the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, whether founded upon certificates or other written documents from public officers, or otherwise, which have not already been barred by any act of limitation, and which shall not be presented at the Treasury before the first day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, shall forever after be barred and precluded from settlement or allowance: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect Loan Office certificates, certificates of final settlement, indents of interest, balances entered in the books of the Register of the Treasury, certificates issued by the Register of the Treasury, commonly called registered certificates, Loans of money obtained in foreign countries, or certificates issued pursuant to the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the proper officers of the Treasury from demanding an account or accounts to be rendered for any moneys heretofore advanced, and not accounted for, or from admitting, under the usual forms and restrictions, credits for expenditures, equal to the sums which have been so advanced.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Auditor of the Treasury to receive all such claims aforesaid, as have not been heretofore barred by any act of limitation, as shall be presented before the time aforesaid, with the certificates or other documents in support thereof, and to cause a record to be made of the names of the persons, and of the time when the said claims are presented; which record shall be made in the presence of the person or persons presenting the same, and shall be the only evidence that the said claims were presented, during the time limited by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury, to make report to Congress upon all such of the said claims as shall not be allowed to be valid, according to the usual forms of the Treasury.

Approved, February 12, 1793.

An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters.

Be it enacted, &c., That, whenever the Executive authority of any State in the Union, or of either of the Territories Northwest or South of the river Ohio, shall demand any person as a fugitive from justice, of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, and shall moreover produce the copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory as aforesaid, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the Governor or Chief Magistrate of the State or Territory from whence the person so charged fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, and notice of the arrest to be given to the Executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority, appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear; but, if no such agent shall appear within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged: and all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive to the State or Territory making such demand, shall be paid by such State or Territory.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any agent appointed as aforesaid, who shall receive the fugitive into his custody, shall be empowered to transport him or her to the State or Territory from which he or she shall have fled. And if any person or persons shall, by force, set at liberty, or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting, as aforesaid, the person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding one year.

Sec. 3. And be it also enacted, That when a person held to labor in any of the United States, or in either of the Territories on the Northwest or South of the river Ohio, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other of the said States or Territory, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is hereby empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any Judge of the Circuit or District Courts of the United States, residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of such Judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit taken before and certified by a magistrate of any such State or Territory, that the person so seized or arrested, doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such Judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, his agent, or attorney, which shall be sufficient warrant for removing the said fugitive from labor to the State or Territory from which he or she fled.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder such claimant, his agent or attorney, in so doing, or who shall knowingly and willingly aid, abet, or assist in such obstruction, or who shall rescue or arrest such fugitive from labor, or shall rescue such fugitive from such claimant, his agent or attorney, when so arrested pursuant to the authority herein given or declared; or shall harbor or conceal such person after notice that he or she was so arrested from labor, as aforesaid, shall, for either of the said offences, forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars. Which penalty may be recovered by and for the benefit of such claimant, by action of debt, in any Court proper to try the same, saving moreover to the person claiming such labor or service his right of action for or on account of the said injuries, or either of them.

Approved, February 12, 1793.

An Act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the Coasting Trade and Fisheries, and for regulating the same.

Be it enacted, &c., That ships or vessels, enrolled by virtue of "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes," and those of twenty tons and upwards, which shall be enrolled after the last day of May next, in pursuance of this act, and having a license in force, or if less than twenty tons, not being enrolled, shall have a license in force, as is hereinafter required, and no others, shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of May next, in order for the enrollment of any ship or vessel, she shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites, in all respects, shall be complied with, as are made necessary for registering ships or vessels, by the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," and the same duties and authorities are hereby given and imposed on all officers, respectively, in relation to such enrollments, and the same proceedings shall be had, in similar cases, touching such enrollments; and the ships or vessels so enrolled, with the master, or owner, or owners thereof, shall be subject to the same requisites, as are in those respects provided for vessels registered by virtue of the aforesaid act; the record of which enrollment shall be made, and an abstract or copy thereof granted, as nearly as may be, in the form following: "Enrollment in conformity to an act of the Congress of the United States of America," entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels," to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," [inserting here the name of the person, with his occupation and place of abode, by whom the oath or affirmation is to be made] having taken and subscribed the oath, (or affirmation) required by this act, and having sworn (or affirmed) that he, or (she, and if more than one owner, adding the words "together with," and the name or names, occupation or occupations, place or places of abode, of the owner or owners) is, (or are) a citizen (or citizens) of the United States, and sole owner (or owners) of the ship or vessel, called the [inserting here her name] of [inserting here the name of the port, to which she may belong] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, and is a citizen of the United States, and that the said ship or vessel was [inserting here when and where built] and [inserting here, the name and office, if any, of the person, by whom she shall have been surveyed or admeasured] having certified, that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here, the number of decks] and [inserting here, the number of masts] and that her length is [inserting here, the number of feet] her breadth [inserting here, the number of feet] her depth [inserting here, the number of feet] and that she measures [inserting here, her number of tons] that she is [describing here, the particular kind of vessel, whether ship, brigantine, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else, together with her build, and specifying, whether she has any or no gallery or head] and the said [naming the owner, or the master, or other person acting in behalf of the owner or owners, by whom the certificate of admeasurement shall have been countersigned] having agreed to the description and admeasurement above specified, and sufficient security having been given, according to the said act, the said ship or vessel has been duly enrolled, at the port of [naming the port where enrolled.] Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said port] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year, [specifying the number of the year, in words at length.]"

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the collectors of the several districts, to enroll and license any ship or vessel, that may be registered, upon such registry being given up, or to register any ship or vessel, that may be enrolled, upon such enrollment and license being given up. And when any ship or vessel shall be in any other district, than the one, to which she belongs, the collector of such district, on the application of the master or commander thereof, and upon his taking an oath or affirmation, that according to his best knowledge and belief, the property remains, as expressed in the register or enrollment proposed to be given up, and upon his giving the bonds required for granting registers, shall make the exchanges aforesaid; but in every such case, the collector, to whom the register, or enrollment and license, may be given up, shall transmit the same to the Register of the Treasury; and the register, or enrollment and license, granted in lieu thereof, shall, within ten days after the arrival of such ship or vessel within the district, to which she belongs, be delivered to the collector of the said district, and be by him cancelled. And if the said master or commander shall neglect to deliver the said register or enrollment and license, within the time aforesaid, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in order to the licensing of any ship or vessel, for carrying on the Coasting Trade or Fisheries, the husband, or managing owner, together with the master thereof, with one more sureties to the satisfaction of the collector granting the same, shall become bound to pay to the United States, if such ship or vessel be of the burden of five tons, and less than twenty tons, the sum of one hundred dollars; and if twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, the sum of two hundred dollars; and if above thirty tons, and not exceeding sixty tons, the sum of five hundred dollars; and if above sixty tons, the sum of one thousand dollars, in case it shall appear, within two years from the date of the bond, that such ship or vessel has been employed in any trade, whereby the revenue of the United States has been defrauded during the time the license granted to such ship or vessel remained in force; and the master of such ship or vessel shall also swear, or affirm, that he is a citizen of the United States, and that such license shall not be used for any other vessel, or any other employment, than that for which it is specially granted, or in any trade or business, whereby the revenue of the United States may be defrauded; and if such ship or vessel be less than twenty tons burden, the husband or managing owner, shall swear or affirm, that she is wholly the property of a citizen or citizens of the United States; whereupon it shall be the duty of the collector of the district comprehending the port, whereto such ship or vessel may belong, (the duty of six cents per ton being first paid,) to grant a license, in the form following: "License for carrying on the [here insert, coasting trade, whale fishery, or cod fishery, as the case may be.]"

In pursuance of an act of the Congress of the United States of America, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," [inserting here the name of the husband or managing owner, with his occupation and place of abode, and the name of the master, with the place of his abode,] having given bond, that the [insert here, the description of the vessel, whether ship, brigantine, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else she may be,] called the [insert here, the vessel's name] whereof the said [naming the master] is master, burden [insert here, the number of tons, in words] tons, as appears by her enrollment, dated at [naming the district, day, month, and year, in words at length, but if she be less than twenty tons, insert instead thereof] [proof being had of her admeasurement] shall not be employed in any trade, while this license shall continue in force, whereby the revenue of the United States shall be defrauded, and having also sworn (or affirmed) that this license shall not be used for any other vessel, or for any other employment, than is herein specified, license is hereby granted for the said [inserting here, the description of the vessel] called the [inserting here, the vessel's name] to be employed in carrying on the [inserting here, coasting trade, whale fishery, or cod fishery, as the case may be] for one year from the date hereof, and no longer. Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said district] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year, [specifying the number of the year, in words at length.]"

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no license, granted to any ship or vessel, shall be considered in force, any longer than such ship or vessel is owned, and of the description set forth in such license, or for carrying on any other business or employment, than that for which she is specially licensed, and if any ship or vessel be found with a forged or altered license, or making use of a license granted for any other ship or vessel, such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, after the last day of May next, every ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards (other than such as are registered) found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, or if less than twenty tons, and not less than five tons, without a license, in manner as is provided by this act, such ship or vessel, if laden with goods, the growth or manufacture of the United States only (distilled spirits excepted) or in ballast, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States, at which she may arrive, as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, and if she have on board any articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than sea-stores, the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the lading found on board, shall be forfeited: Provided, however, if such ship or vessel be at sea, at the expiration of the time, for which the license was given, and the master of such ship or vessel shall swear or affirm that such was the case, and shall also within forty-eight hours after his arrival deliver to the collector of the district in which he shall first arrive the license which shall have expired, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, nor shall the ship or vessel be liable to pay the fees and tonnage aforesaid.

cord thereof in a book, to be by him kept for that purpose, and shall, once in three months, transmit to the Register of the Treasury, copies of the licenses, which shall have been so granted by him; and also of such licenses, as shall have been given up or returned to him, respectively, in pursuance of this act. And where any ship or vessel shall be licensed, or enrolled anew, or being licensed or enrolled, shall afterwards be registered, or being registered, shall afterwards be enrolled, or licensed, she shall, in every such case, be enrolled, licensed or registered by her former name.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, if any ship or vessel, enrolled or licensed, as aforesaid, shall proceed on a foreign voyage, without first giving up her enrollment and license, to the collector of the district comprehending the port, from which she is about to proceed on such foreign voyage, and being duly registered by such collector, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandise, so imported therein, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture: Provided, always, If the port, from which such ship or vessel is about to proceed on such foreign voyage, be not within the district, where such ship or vessel is enrolled, the collector of such district shall give to the master of such ship or vessel a certificate, specifying that the enrollment and license of such ship or vessel is received by him, and the time when it was so received; which certificate shall afterwards be delivered by the said master to the collector, who may have granted such enrollment and license.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the license, granted to any ship or vessel, shall be given up to the collector of the district, who may have granted the same, within three days after the expiration of the time, for which it was granted, in case such ship or vessel be then within the district, or if she be absent, at that time, within three days from her first arrival within the district afterwards, or if she be sold out of the district, within three days after the arrival of the master within any district, to the collector of such district taking his certificate therefor; and if the master thereof shall neglect, or refuse to deliver up the license, as aforesaid, he shall forfeit fifty dollars; but if such license shall have been previously given up to the collector of any other district, as authorized by this act, and a certificate thereof under the hand of such collector, be produced by such master, or if such license be lost, or destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, so that it cannot be found, and the master of such ship or vessel shall make and subscribe an oath or affirmation, that such license is lost, destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, as he verily believes, and that the same, if found, shall be delivered up, as is herein required, then the aforesaid penalty shall not be incurred. And if such license shall be lost, destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, as aforesaid, before the expiration of the time, for which it was granted, upon the like oath or affirmation being made and subscribed by the master of such ship or vessel, the said collector is hereby authorized and required, upon application being made therefor, to license such ship or vessel anew.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the owner or owners of any licensed ship or vessel, to return such license to the collector who granted the same, at any time within the year, for which it was granted, who shall thereupon, cancel the same, and shall license such vessel anew, upon the application of the owner or owners, and upon the conditions herein before required, being complied with; and in case the term, for which the former license was granted, shall not be expired, an abatement of the tonnage of six cents per ton shall be made, in the proportion of the time so unexpired.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That every licensed ship or vessel shall have her name, and the port to which she belongs, painted on her stern, in the manner as is provided for registered ships or vessels, and if any licensed ship or vessel be found, without such painting, the owner or owners thereof shall pay twenty dollars.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, when the master of any licensed ship or vessel, ferry boats excepted, shall be changed, the new master, or, in case of his absence, the owner or one of the owners thereof, shall report such change to the collector residing at the port where the same may happen, if there be one, otherwise, to the collector residing at any port, where such ship or vessel may next arrive, who, upon the oath or affirmation of such new master, or in case of his absence, of the owner or one of the owners, that he is a citizen of the United States, and that such ship or vessel shall not, while such license continues in force, be employed in any manner, whereof the revenue of the United States may be defrauded, shall endorse such change on the license, with the name of the new master; and when any change shall happen, as aforesaid, and such change shall not be reported, and the endorsement made of such change, as is herein required, such ship or vessel, found carrying on the coasting trade or fisheries, shall be subject to pay the same fees and tonnage, as a vessel of the United States, having a register, and the said new master shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten dollars.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful, at all times, for any officer concerned in the collection of the revenue, to inspect the enrollment or license of any ship or vessel; and if the master of any such ship or vessel shall not exhibit the same, when thereunto required by such officer, he shall pay one hundred dollars.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, determined from a district in one State, to a district in the same, or an adjoining State on the sea coast, or on a navigable river, having on board, either distilled spirits in casks exceeding five hundred gallons, wine in casks exceeding two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles exceeding one hundred dozens, sugar in casks or boxes exceeding three thousand pounds, tea in chests or boxes exceeding five hundred pounds, coffee in casks or bags exceeding one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise, as imported, exceeding in value four hundred dollars, or goods, wares or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value exceeds eight hundred dollars, and arriving from a district in one State, at a district in the same or an adjoining State on the sea coast, or on a navigable river, shall, previous to the unloading of any part of the cargo of such ship or vessel, deliver to the collector, if there be one, or if not, to the surveyor residing at the port of her arrival, or if there be no collector or surveyor residing at such port, then to a collector or surveyor, if there be any such officer, residing within five miles thereof, the manifest of the cargo, certified by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she sailed, (if there be four hundred dollars, or goods, wares or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value exceeds eight hundred dollars, shall, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel, from the port where she may then be, make out and subscribe duplicate manifests of the whole of such cargo on board such ship or vessel, specifying in such manifests, the marks and numbers of every cask, bag, box, chest or package containing the same, with the name and place of residence of every shipper and consignee, and the quantity shipped by and to each, and if there be a collector or surveyor, residing at such port, or within five miles thereof, he shall deliver such manifests to the collector, if there be one, otherwise to the surveyor, before whom he shall swear or affirm, to the best of his knowledge and belief, that the goods therein contained were legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured, or if spirits distilled within the United States, that the duties thereupon have been paid or secured, whereupon the said collector or surveyor shall certify the same on the said manifest, one of which he shall return to the said master, with a permit, specifying thereon, generally, the lading on board such ship or vessel, and authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. And if any ship or vessel, being laden and destined, as aforesaid, shall depart from the port where she may then be, without the master or commander having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests of the lading on board such ship or vessel, and in case there be a collector or surveyor residing at such port, or within five miles thereof, without having previously delivered the same to the said collector or surveyor, and obtaining a permit, in manner as is herein required, such master or commander shall pay one hundred dollars.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, having on board, either distilled spirits in casks exceeding five hundred gallons, wine in casks exceeding two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles exceeding one hundred dozens, sugar in casks or boxes exceeding three thousand pounds, tea in chests or boxes exceeding five hundred pounds, coffee in casks or bags exceeding one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise in packages, as imported, exceeding in value four hundred dollars, or goods, wares or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value exceeds eight hundred dollars, and arriving from a district in one State, at a district in the same or an adjoining State on the sea coast, or on a navigable river, shall, previous to the unloading of any part of the cargo of such ship or vessel, deliver to the collector, if there be one, or if not, to the surveyor residing at the port of her arrival, or if there be no collector or surveyor residing at such port, then to a collector or surveyor, if there be any such officer, residing within five miles thereof, the manifest of the cargo, certified by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she sailed, (if there be such manifest,) otherwise the duplicate manifests thereof, as is herein before directed, to the truth of which, before such officer, he shall swear or affirm. And if there have been taken on board such ship or vessel, any other or more goods, than are contained in such manifest or manifests, since her departure from the port, from whence she first sailed, or if any goods have been since landed, the said master or commander shall make known and particularize the same to the said collector or surveyor, or if no such goods have been so taken on board or landed, he shall so declare, to the truth of which he shall swear or affirm: Whereupon, the said collector or surveyor shall grant a permit for unlading a part, or the whole of such cargo, as the said master or commander may request. And if there be no collector or surveyor, residing at, or within five miles of the said port of her arrival, the master or commander of such ship or vessel, may proceed to discharge the lading from on board such ship or vessel, but shall deliver to the collector or surveyor, residing at the first port, where he may next afterwards arrive, and within twenty-four hours of his arrival, the manifest or manifests aforesaid, noting thereon the times when, and places where, the goods, therein mentioned, have been unladed, to the truth of which, before the said last mentioned collector or surveyor, he shall swear or affirm; and if the master or commander of any such ship or vessel, being laden as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse to deliver the manifest or manifests, at the times, and in the manner, herein directed, he shall pay one hundred dollars.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, and being destined from any district of the United States to a district other than a district in the same, or an adjoining State, on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, shall, previous to her departure, deliver to the collector residing at the port where such ship or vessel may be, if there is one, otherwise to the collector of the district comprehending such port, or to a surveyor within the district, as the one or the other may reside nearest to the port at which such ship or vessel may be, duplicate manifests of the whole cargo on board such ship or vessel; or, if there be no cargo on board, he shall so certify; and, if there be any distilled spirits, or goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture on board, other than what may, by the collector, be deemed sufficient for sea stores, he shall specify, in such manifests, the marks and numbers of every cask, bag, box, chest, or package, containing the same, with the name and place of residence of every shipper and consignee of such distilled spirits or goods of foreign growth or manufacture, and the quantity shipped by, and to each, to be by him subscribed, and to the truth of which he shall swear or affirm, and shall also swear or affirm, before the said collector or surveyor, that such goods, wares or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, were, to the best of his knowledge and belief, legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured; or, if spirits distilled within the United States, that the duties thereupon have been duly paid or secured; upon the performance of which, and not before, the said collector or surveyor shall certify the same on the said manifests, one of which he shall return to the master, with a permit thereto annexed, authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination: and if any such ship or vessel shall depart from the port where she may then be, having distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, on board, without the several things herein required being complied with, the master thereof shall forfeit one hundred dollars; or, if the lading be of goods the growth or manufacture of the United States only, or if such ship or vessel have no cargo, and she depart without the several things herein required being complied with, the said master shall forfeit and pay fifty dollars.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed to carry on the coasting trade, arriving at any district of the United States from any district other than a district in the same or an adjoining State on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, shall deliver to the collector residing at the port where she may arrive, if there be one, otherwise to the collector or surveyor in the district comprehending such port, as the one or the other may reside nearest thereto, if the collector or surveyor reside at a distance not exceeding five miles, within twenty-four hours, or, if at a greater distance, within forty-eight hours next after his arrival; and, previous to the unlading any of the goods brought in such ship or vessel, the manifest of the cargo, (if there be any,) certified by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she last sailed, and shall make oath or affirmation before the said collector or surveyor that there was not when he sailed from the district where his manifest was certified, or has been since, or then is, any more or other goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, (if there be any) other than sea-stores on board such vessel, than is therein mentioned; and, if there be no such goods, he shall so swear or affirm; and, if there be no cargo on board, he shall produce the certificate of the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she last sailed, as aforesaid, that such is the case; whereupon such collector or surveyor shall grant a permit for unlading the whole or part of such cargo (if there be any) within his district, as the master may request; and, where a part only of the goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or of distilled spirits, brought in such ship or vessel, is intended to be landed, the said collector or surveyor shall make an endorsement of such part, on the back of the manifest, specifying the articles to be landed, and shall return such manifest to the master, endorsing also thereon his permission for such ship or vessel to proceed to the place of her destination; and, if the master of such ship or vessel shall neglect or refuse to deliver the manifest, (or, if she has no cargo, the certificate,) within the time herein directed, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars, and the goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, found on board, or landed from such ship or vessel, not being certified, as is herein required, shall be forfeited; and, if the same shall amount to the value of eight hundred dollars, such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be also forfeited.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to oblige the master or commander of any ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, bound from a district in one State to a district in the same, or an adjoining State on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, product, or manufactures of the United States only, (except distilled spirits,) or distilled spirits, not more than five hundred gallons, wine in casks not more than two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles not more than one hundred dozens, sugar, in casks or boxes, not more than three thousand pounds, tea, in chests or boxes, not more than five hundred pounds, coffee, in casks or bags, not more than one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise, in packages, as imported, of not more value than four hundred dollars, or goods, wares, or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value shall be not more than eight hundred dollars, to deliver a manifest thereof, or obtain a permit, previous to her departure, or on her arrival within such district, to make any report thereof; but such master shall be provided with a manifest, by him subscribed, of the lading, of what kind soever, which was on board such ship or vessel at the time of his departure from the district from which she last sailed, and if the same, or any part of such lading, consists of distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, with the marks and numbers of each cask, bag, box, chest, or package, containing the same, with the name of the shipper and consignee of each, which manifest shall be by him exhibited for the inspection of any officer of the revenue, when by such officer thereunto required, and shall also inform such officer from whence such ship or vessel last sailed, and how long she has been in port, when by him so interrogated; and if the master of such ship or vessel shall not be provided, on his arrival within any such district, with a manifest, and exhibit the same, as is herein required, if the lading of such ship or vessel consist wholly of goods the produce or manufacture of the United States, (distilled spirits excepted,) he shall forfeit twenty dollars; or, if there be distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, on board, excepting what may be sufficient for sea stores, he shall forfeit forty dollars; or, if he shall refuse to answer the interrogatories truly, as is herein required, he shall forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars; and if any of the goods laden on board such ship or vessel shall be of foreign growth or manufacture, or of spirits distilled within the United States, so much of the same as may be found on board such ship or vessel, and which shall not be included in the manifest exhibited by such master, shall be forfeited.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the collector of the district of Pennsylvania to grant permits for the transportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, across the State of New Jersey to the district of New York, or across the State of Delaware to any district in the State of Maryland or Virginia; and for the collector of the district of New York to grant like permits for the transportation across the State of New Jersey, and for the collector of any district of Maryland or Virginia to grant like permits for the transportation across the State of Delaware to the district of Pennsylvania: Provided, That every such permit shall express the name of the owner or person to whom such goods shall be consigned, with the marks, numbers, and description of the packages, whether bale, box, chest, or otherwise, and the kind of goods contained therein, and the date when granted; and the owner or person sending such goods shall swear or affirm that they were legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured: And provided, also, That the owner or consignee of all such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall, within twenty-four hours after the arrival thereof at the place to which they were permitted to be transported, report the same to the collector of the district where they shall so arrive, and shall deliver up the permit accompanying the same; and, if the owner or consignee shall neglect or refuse to make due entry of such goods within the time and in the manner herein directed, all such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be subject to forfeiture; and, if the permit granted shall not be given up within the time limited for making the said report, the person or persons to whom it was granted, neglecting or refusing to deliver it up, shall forfeit fifty dollars for every twenty-four hours it shall be withheld afterwards: Provided, That where the goods, wares, and merchandise, to be transported in manner aforesaid, shall be of less value than eight hundred dollars, the said oath and permit shall not be deemed necessary, nor shall the owner or consignee be obliged to make report to the collector of the district where the said goods, wares, and merchandise, shall arrive.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That, when any ship or vessel of the United States, registered according to law, shall be employed in going from any one district in the United States to any other district, such ship or vessel, and the master or commander thereof, with the goods she may have on board, previous to her departure from the district where she may be, and also upon her arrival in any other district, shall be subject (except as to the payment of fees) to the same regulations, provisions, penalties, and forfeitures; and the like duties are imposed on like officers as is provided by the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of this act for ships or vessels licensed for carrying on the coasting trade: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to registered ships or vessels of the United States, having on board goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, brought into the United States in such ship or vessel from a foreign port, and on which the duties have not been paid or secured, according to law.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That, when any ship or vessel, licensed for carrying on the fishery, shall be intended to touch and trade at any foreign port or place, it shall be the duty of the master, commander, or owner, to obtain permission for that purpose from the collector of the district where such ship or vessel may be, previous to her departure, and the master or commander of every such ship or vessel shall deliver like manifests and make like entries, both of the ship or vessel and of the goods, wares, or merchandise on board, within the same time, and under the same penalty as, by the laws of the United States, are provided for ships or vessels of the United States arriving from a foreign port. And if any ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the fisheries shall be found within three leagues of the coast with goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture exceeding the value of five hundred dollars, without having such permit as is herein directed, such ship or vessel, together with the goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture imported therein, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel employed in the transportation of goods from district to district that shall put into a port other than the one to which she was bound, shall, within twenty-four hours of his arrival, if there be an officer residing at such port, and she continue there so long, make report of his arrival to such officer, with the name of the place he came from, and to which he is bound, with an account of his lading; and if the master of such ship or vessel shall neglect or refuse to do the same, he shall forfeit twenty dollars.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That if the master or commander of any ship or vessel, employed in the transportation of goods from district to district, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, shall, on his arrival at the port to which he was destined, have lost or mislaid the certified manifest of the same, or the permit which was given therefor, by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence he sailed, the collector of the district where he shall so arrive shall take bond for the payment of the duties on such goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, within six months, in the same manner as though they were imported from a foreign country: Provided, however, Such bond shall be cancelled, if the said master shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, to the collector taking such bond, and within the term therein limited for payment, a certificate from the collector or surveyor of the district from whence he sailed that such goods were legally exported in such ship or vessel from such district.

person or persons shall assault, resist, obstruct, or hinder any officer in the execution of this act, or of any other act or law of the United States herein mentioned, or of any of the powers or authorities vested in him by this act, or any other act or law, as aforesaid, all and every person and persons so offending shall, for every such offence, for which no other penalty is particularly provided, forfeit five hundred dollars.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That if any licensed ship or vessel shall be transferred, in whole or in part, to any person who is not at the time of such transfer a citizen of and resident within the United States, or if any such ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, or shall be found with a forged or altered license, or one granted for any other ship or vessel, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited.

Sec. 33. Provided, nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That in all cases where the whole, or any part, of the lading or cargo on board any ship or vessel shall belong bona fide to any person or persons other than the master, owner, or managers of such ship or vessel, and upon which the duties shall have been previously paid or secured, according to law, shall be exempted from any forfeiture under this act, anything therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That the fees and allowances for the several duties and services to be performed in virtue of this act shall be as follow, that is to say:

For admeasuring every ship or vessel, in order to the enrolment or licensing and recording the same, if of the burden of five tons, and less than twenty tons, fifty cents; if of twenty tons, and not exceeding seventy tons, seventy-five cents; if above seventy tons, and not exceeding one hundred tons, one hundred cents; if above one hundred tons, one hundred and fifty cents.

For every certificate of enrolment, fifty cents.

For every endorsement on a certificate of enrolment, twenty cents.

For every license, and granting the same, including the bond, if not exceeding twenty tons, twenty-five cents; if above twenty, and not more than one hundred tons, fifty cents; and if more than one hundred tons, one hundred cents.

For every endorsement on a license, twenty cents.

For certifying manifests, and granting a permit for a licensed vessel to proceed from district to district, twenty-five cents, if less than fifty tons; and if above fifty tons, fifty cents.

For receiving a certified manifest, and granting a permit on the arrival of such vessel, twenty-five cents, if less than fifty tons; and if above fifty tons, fifty cents.

For certifying manifests, and granting a permit for a registered vessel to proceed from district to district, one hundred and fifty cents.

For receiving a certified manifest, and granting a permit, on the arrival of such registered vessel, one hundred and fifty cents.

For granting a permit for a vessel, not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, to proceed from district to district, and receiving the manifest, two hundred cents.

For receiving a manifest, and granting a permit to unload, for such last mentioned vessel, on her arrival in one district from another district, two hundred cents.

For granting a permit for a vessel carrying on the fishery, to trade at a foreign port, twenty-five cents; and for the report and entry of any foreign goods imported in such vessel, twenty-five cents. And where a surveyor shall certify a manifest, or grant a permit, or receive a certified manifest, and grant a permit, the fees arising therefrom shall be received by him solely for his use. And all other fees arising by virtue of this act shall be received and accounted for by the collector, or, at his option, by the naval officer, where there is one; and where there is a collector, naval officer, and surveyor, shall be equally divided, monthly, between the said officers; and where there is no naval officer, two-thirds to the collector, and the other third to the surveyor; and where there is only a collector, he shall receive the whole amount thereof; and where there is more than one surveyor in any district, each of them shall receive his proportionable part of such fees as shall arise in the port for which he is appointed: Provided, always, That, in all cases where the tonnage of any ship or vessel shall be ascertained, by any person appointed for that purpose, such person shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, out of the fees aforesaid, before any distribution thereof as aforesaid; and every collector and naval officer, and every surveyor, who shall reside at a port where there is no collector, shall cause to be affixed, and constantly kept in some conspicuous place of his office, a fair table of the rates of fees demandable by this act.

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred by virtue and force of this act, shall and may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered in like manner as penalties and forfeitures incurred by virtue of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, and shall be appropriated in like manner: Provided, always, That if any officer, entitled to a part or share of any such penalty or forfeiture, shall be necessary as a witness on the trial for such penalty or forfeiture, such officer may be a witness upon the said trial; but in such case he shall not receive, or be entitled to any part or share of the said penalty or forfeiture, and the part or share to which he would otherwise have been entitled, shall accrue to the United States.

Sec. 36. And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence and take effect from and after the last day of May next, and thenceforth the act, entitled "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes," and also the act, entitled "An act to

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every foreign ship or vessel, bound from a district in the United States to any other district within the same, shall, in all cases, previous to her departure from such district, deliver to the collector of such district, duplicate manifests of the lading on board such ship or vessel, if there be any, or, if there be none, he shall declare that such is the case, and to the truth of such manifests or declaration, he shall swear or affirm, and also obtain a permit, from the said collector, authorizing him to proceed to the place of his destination. And the master or commander of every such ship or vessel, on his arrival within any district, from any other district, shall, in all cases, within forty-eight hours after his arrival, and previous to the unloading any goods from on board such ship or vessel, deliver to the collector of the district where he may have arrived, a manifest of the goods laden on board such ship, or vessel, if any there be, or if in ballast only, he shall so declare, and to the truth of which manifest or declaration, he shall swear or affirm; and also, that such manifest contains an account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise which were on board such ship or vessel, at the time, or have been, since her departure from the place, from whence she shall be reported last to have sailed; and he shall also deliver to such collector the permit which was given him from the collector of the district from whence he sailed. And if the master or commander of any such ship or vessel, shall neglect or refuse complying with any of the requirements herein made, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars: Provided, always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting the payment of tonnage, or any other requirements which such ships or vessels are now subject to by the present existing laws of the United States.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That in every case, where the collector is, by this act, directed to grant any enrolment, license, certificate, permit, or other document, the naval officer residing at the port (if there be one) shall sign the same, and every surveyor who shall certify a manifest, or grant a permit, or who shall receive any certified manifest, or a permit as is provided for in this act, shall make monthly returns thereof, or sooner, if it can conveniently be made, to the collector of the district where such surveyor may reside.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That, before any ship or vessel, of the burden of five tons and less than twenty tons, shall be licensed, the same admeasurement shall be made of such ship or vessel, and the same provisions observed relative thereto, as are to be observed in case of admeasuring ships or vessels to be registered or enrolled; but in all cases where such ship or vessel, or any other licensed ship or vessel, shall have been once admeasured, it shall not be necessary to measure such ship or vessel anew, for the purpose of obtaining another enrolment or license, except such ship or vessel shall have undergone some alteration as to her burden, subsequent to the time of her former license.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any officer of the revenue to go on board of any ship or vessel, whether she shall be within or without his district, and the same to inspect, search, and examine, and if it shall appear that any breach of the laws of the United States has been committed, whereby such ship or vessel, or the goods, wares, and merchandise on board, or any part thereof, is, or are liable to forfeiture, to make seizure of the same.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That, in every case where a forfeiture of any ship or vessel, or of any goods, wares, or merchandise shall accrue, it shall be the duty of the collector, or other proper officer, who shall give notice of the seizure of such ship or vessel, or of such goods, wares, or merchandise, to insert in the same advertisement the name or names and the place or places of residence of the person or persons to whom any such ship or vessel, goods, wares, and merchandise belonged or were consigned, at the time of such seizure, if the same shall be known to him.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That every collector who shall knowingly make any record of enrolment or license of any ship or vessel, and every other officer or person, appointed by, or under them, who shall make any record, or grant any certificate or other document whatever, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall take any other or greater fees than are by this act allowed, or shall receive, for any service performed pursuant to this act, any reward or gratuity, and every surveyor or vessels, who shall wilfully deceive or to any collector or naval officer a false description of any ship or vessel, to be enrolled or licensed, in pursuance of this act, shall upon conviction of any such neglect or offence, forfeit to the United States five hundred dollars, and be rendered incapable of serving in any office of trust or profit under the United States. And if any person authorized and required by this act, in respect to his office, to perform any act or thing required by this act, shall wilfully neglect or refuse to do and perform the same, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, such person, on being duly convicted thereof, if not hereby subject to the penalty and disqualifications aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars for the first offence, and a like sum for the second offence, and shall from thenceforward be rendered incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall swear or affirm to any of the matters herein required to be verified, knowing the same to be false, such person or persons shall suffer the like pains and penalties as shall be incurred by persons committing wilful and corrupt perjury. And if any person or persons shall forge, counterfeit, erase, alter, or falsify any enrolment, license, certificate, permit, or other document, mentioned or required in this act to be granted by any officer of the revenue, such person or persons so offending shall forfeit five hundred dollars.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That if any explain and amend an act, entitled 'An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes,' shall be repealed and cease to operate, except as to the validity of the registers, records, enrolments, and licenses, with the certificates and documents, which shall have been done or granted, in pursuance of those acts, prior to the first day of June next, which shall continue to be of the like force and effect as if the said acts were not repealed; and except, also, as to the prosecution, recovery, and distribution of, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which may have been incurred prior to the first day of June next, for which purpose, likewise, the said acts shall continue in force.

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to any boat or lighter, not being masted, or if masted, and not decked, employed in the harbor of any town or city.

Approved, February 18, 1793.

An Act providing compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the third day of March, in the present year, the compensation of the President of the United States shall be at the rate of twenty-five thousand dollars per annum, with the use of the furniture and other effects belonging to the United States, and now in possession of the President; and that of the Vice President, at the rate of five thousand dollars per annum, in full for their respective services, to be paid quarter-yearly at the Treasury.

Approved, February 18, 1793.

An Act to repeal part of a Resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincent.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, as requires the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers at Post Saint Vincents, to pay for the survey of the several tracts which they rightfully claimed, and which had been allotted to them, according to the laws and usages of the Government, under which they had settled, be, and hereby is, repealed: and that such surveys thereof, as may have been made, be paid for by the United States, not exceeding the rates hitherto established by Congress for making surveys.

Approved, February 21, 1793.

An Act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the Act heretofore made for that purpose.

Be it enacted, &c., That when any person or persons, being a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall allege that he or they have invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, not known or used before the application, and shall present a petition to the Secretary of State, signifying a desire of obtaining an exclusive property in the same, and praying that a patent may be granted therefor, it shall and may be lawful for the said Secretary of State to cause letters patent to be made out in the name of the United States, bearing teste by the President of the United States, reciting the allegations and suggestions of the said petition, and giving a short description of the said invention or discovery, and thereupon granting to such petitioner or petitioners, his, her, or their heirs, administrators or assigns, for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using and vending to others to be used, the said invention or discovery, which letters patent shall be delivered to the Attorney General of the United States, to be examined; who, within fifteen days after such delivery, if he finds the same conformable to this act, shall certify accordingly at the foot thereof, and return the same to the Secretary of State, who shall present the letters patent thus certified, to be signed, and shall cause the seal of the United States to be thereto affixed; and the same shall be good and available to the grantee or grantees, by force of this act, and shall be recorded in a book, to be kept for that purpose, in the office of the Secretary of State, and delivered to the patentee or his order.

SEC. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That any person who shall have discovered an improvement in the principle of any machine, or in the process of any composition of matter, which shall have been patented, and shall have obtained a patent for such improvement, he shall not be at liberty to make, use, or vend the original discovery, nor shall the first inventor be at liberty to use the improvement. And it is hereby enacted and declared, that simply changing the form or the proportions of any machine, or composition of matter, in any degree, shall not be deemed a discovery.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every inventor, before he can receive a patent, shall swear or affirm that he does verily believe that he is the true inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, or improvement, for which he solicits a patent, which oath or affirmation may be made before any person authorized to administer oaths, and shall deliver a written description of his invention, and of the manner of using, or process of compounding the same, in such full, clear, and exact terms, as to distinguish the same from all other things before known, and to enable any person skilled in the art or science, of which it is a branch, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compound, and use the same. And in the case of any machine, he shall fully explain the principle, and the several modes in which he has contemplated the application of that principle or character, by which it may be distinguished from other inventions; and he shall accompany the whole with drawings and written references, where the nature of the case admits of drawings, or with specimens of the ingredients, and of the composition of matter, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment, where the invention is of a composition of matter; which description, signed by himself, and attested by two witnesses, shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and certified copies thereof shall be competent evidence, in all Courts, where any matter or thing, touching such patent right, shall come in question. And such inventor shall, moreover, deliver a model of his machine, provided the Secretary shall deem such model to be necessary.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any inventor, his executor, or administrator, to assign the title and interest in the said invention, at any time, and the assignee having recorded the said assignment, in the office of the Secretary of State, shall thereafter stand in the place of the original inventor, both as to right and responsibility, and so the assignees of assignees, to any degree.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall make, devise, and use, or sell the thing so invented, the exclusive right of which shall, as aforesaid, have been secured to any person by patent, without the consent of the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, first obtained in writing, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay, to the patentee, a sum that shall be at least equal to three times the price for which the patentee has usually sold or licensed to other persons the use of the said invention; which may be recovered in an action on the case, founded on this act, in the Circuit Court of the United States, or any other Court having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 6. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the defendant in such action shall be permitted to plead the general issue, and give this act and any special matter, of which notice in writing may have been given to the plaintiff or his attorney, thirty days before trial, in evidence, tending to prove that the specification filed by the plaintiff does not contain the whole truth relative to his discovery, or that it contains more than is necessary to produce the described effect, which concealment or addition shall fully appear to have been made, for the purpose of deceiving the public, or that the thing, thus secured by patent, was not originally discovered by the patentee, but had been in use, or had been described in some public work, anterior to the supposed discovery of the patentee, or that he had surreptitiously obtained a patent for the discovery of another person; in either of which cases, judgment shall be rendered for the defendant, with costs, and the patent shall be declared void.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That where any State, before its adoption of the present form of Government, shall have granted an exclusive right to any invention, the party claiming that right shall not be capable of obtaining an exclusive right under this act, but on relinquishing his right under such particular State, and of such relinquishment, his obtaining an exclusive right under this act shall be sufficient evidence.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the persons whose applications for patents were, at the time of passing this act, depending before the Secretary of State, Secretary at War, and Attorney General, according to the act, passed the second session of the first Congress, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," on complying with the conditions of this act, and paying the fees herein required, may pursue their respective claims to a patent under the same.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That in case of interfering applications, the same shall be submitted to the arbitration of three persons, one of whom shall be chosen by each of the applicants, and the third person shall be appointed by the Secretary of State; and the decision or award of such arbitrators, delivered to the Secretary of State, in writing, and subscribed by them, or any two of them, shall be final, as far as respects the granting of the patent; and if either of the applicants shall refuse or fail to choose an arbitrator, the patent shall issue to the opposite party. And where there shall be more than two interfering applications, and the parties applying shall not all unite in appointing three arbitrators, it shall be in the power of the Secretary of State to appoint three arbitrators for the purpose.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, upon oath or affirmation being made, before the Judge of the District Court, where the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns reside, that any patent, which shall be issued in pursuance of this act, was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestion, and motion made to the said Court, within three years after issuing the said patent, or not afterwards, it shall and may be lawful for the Judge of the said District Court, if the matter alleged shall appear to him to be sufficient to grant a rule, that the patentee, or his executor, administrator, or assign, show cause why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent. And if sufficient cause shall not be shown to the contrary, the rule shall be made absolute, and thereupon the said Judge shall order process to be issued against such patentee, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, with costs of suit. And in case no sufficient cause shall be shown to the contrary, or if it shall appear that the patentee was not the true inventor or discoverer, judgment shall be rendered by such Court for the repeal of such patent; and if the party, at whose complaint the process issued, shall have judgment given against him, he shall pay all such costs as the defendant shall be put to, in defending the suit, to be taxed by the Court, and recovered in due course of law.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That every inventor, before he presents his petition to the Secretary of State, signifying his desire of obtaining a patent, shall pay into the Treasury thirty dollars, for which he shall take duplicate receipts: one of which receipts he shall deliver to the Secretary of State when he presents his petition; and the money thus paid shall be in full for the sundry services to be performed in the office of the Secretary of State, consequent on such petition, and shall pass to the account of clerk-hire in that office: Provided, nevertheless, That for every copy, which may be required at the said office, of any paper respecting any patent that has been granted, the person obtaining such copy, shall pay at the rate of twenty cents for every copy-sheet of one hundred words, and for every copy of a drawing, the party obtaining the same shall pay two dollars; of which payments, an account shall be rendered annually to the Treasury of the United States, and they shall also pass to the account of clerk-hire in the office of the Secretary of State.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the act passed the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, always, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to invalidate any patent that may have been granted under the authority of the said act; and all patentees under the said act, their executors, administrators, and assigns shall be considered within the purview of this act, in respect to the violation of their rights: Provided, Such violations shall be committed after the passing of this act.

Approved, February 21, 1793.

An Act making Provision for the Persons therein mentioned.

Whereas, Colonel John Harding, and Major Alexander Trueman, while employed in carrying messages of peace to the hostile Indians, were killed by the said Indians:

Be it enacted, &c., That four hundred and fifty dollars per annum, for seven years, be allowed to the widow and orphan children of the said Colonel John Harding; and the sum of three hundred dollars per annum, for the same term of seven years, to the orphan children of the said Major Alexander Trueman, to commence on the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and to be paid half-yearly, at the Treasury, to the said widow, and to the guardians of the said orphan children, or to their legal attorneys.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act for repealing the several Import Laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed.

Be it enacted, &c., That the several laws of the United States, imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on horses, cattle, sheep, swine, or other useful beasts imported into the United States for breed, shall be repealed.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the second section of the act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," which extended the powers of the Board of Commissioners to the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Vermont, be, and hereby is, repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Board of Commissioners established to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, in apportioning the aggregate of all the balances due to each State between the States, agreeably to the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States," shall have no regard to the State of Vermont.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in the apportioning of the balances aforesaid, the State of Kentucky shall be deemed to be included in the State of Virginia, the admission of the said State of Kentucky as a member of the Union notwithstanding.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions.

Whereas, the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," is found by experience inadequate to prevent the admission of improper claims to Invalid Pensions, and not to contain a sufficient facility for the allowance of such as may be well founded. Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the second, third, and fourth sections of the said act be repealed, and that in future, all claims to such pensions shall be regulated in the manner following, to wit: First. All evidence relative to invalids shall be taken upon oath or affirmation, before the Judge of the district in which such invalids reside, or before any three persons specially authorized by commission from the said Judge. Secondly. The evidence relative to any claimant must prove decisive disability to have been the effect of known wounds received while in the actual line of his duty, in the service of the United States during the late war. That this evidence must be the affidavits of the commanding officer or surgeon of the ship, regiment, corps, or company, in which such claimant served, or two other credible witnesses, to the same effect, setting forth the time and place of such known wound. Thirdly. Every claimant shall be examined upon oath or affirmation, by two physicians or surgeons, to be authorized by commission from the said Judge, who shall report, in writing, their opinion, upon oath or affirmation, of the nature of the said disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his livelihood by labor. Fourthly. Every claimant shall produce evidence of the time of his leaving the service of the United States. He must also produce evidence of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county, in which he usually resided for the two years immediately after he left the service, as aforesaid, of the existence of his disability during that period; and ascertaining, of their own knowledge, the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support of the claimant. Fifthly. And the said claimant must produce the evidence of two credible witnesses, of the continuance of his disability from the expiration of the said two years to the time of his application. Sixthly. Each claimant must show a good and sufficient cause why he did not apply for a pension, to the person or persons authorized to examine his claim, on or before the eleventh of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, the time limited for applications of this nature. Seventhly. No evidence of any claimant shall be admitted, whose claim has been examined and rejected on or before the aforesaid eleventh of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Judge of the district shall transmit a list of such claims, accompanied by the evidence herein directed, to the Secretary for the Department of War, in order that the same may be compared with the muster-rolls and other documents in his office; and the said Secretary shall make a statement of the cases of the said claimants to Congress, with such circumstances and remarks as may be necessary in order to enable them to take such order thereon as they may judge proper.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no person not on the Pension List before the twenty-third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be entitled to a pension, who shall not have complied with the rules and regulations herein prescribed; saving, however, to all persons, all and singular their rights founded upon legal adjudications under the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," but it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as may be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the validity of any such rights claimed under the act aforesaid, by the determination of certain persons styling themselves Commissioners.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no claim to a pension shall be allowed under this act, which shall not be presented within two years from the passing the same.

Approved, February 28, 1793.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations herein before made shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit:

First: The sum of six hundred thousand dollars reserved by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. Secondly, the surplus, which may remain unexpended, of the moneys appropriated for the use of the War Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two: And, thirdly, The surplus of the existing revenues of the United States, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, except what may be otherwise appropriated, during the present session of Congress.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow, on account of the said States, any sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, eight hundred thousand dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per centum per annum, and reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States, to be applied for the purposes aforesaid, and to be repaid out of the said surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the present year, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three: And that it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to lend the said sum. And the President of the United States shall cause so much of the Loan, made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, by which it is incorporated, to be paid off, in sums not less than fifty thousand dollars, as, in his opinion, the state of the Treasury may, from time to time, admit, out of any moneys, which may be in the Treasury, having due regard to the exigencies of Government, and the appropriations made and to be made by law.

Approved, February 28, 1793.

An Act to regulate Trade and Intercourse with the Indian Tribes.

Be it enacted &c., That no person shall be permitted to carry on any trade or intercourse with the Indian tribes without a license under the hand and seal of the Superintendent of the Department, or of such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize to grant licenses for that purpose; which Superintendent, or person so authorized, shall, on application, issue such license, for a term not exceeding two years, to any proper person, who shall enter into bond, with one or more sureties, approved of by the Superintendent, or person issuing such license, or by the President of the United States, in the penal sum of one thousand dollars, payable to the United States, conditioned for the true and faithful observance of such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are or shall be made, for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. The said Superintendent, and persons licensed, as aforesaid, shall be governed, in all things touching the said trade and intercourse, by such rules and regulations as the President of the United States shall prescribe.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent, or person issuing such license, shall have full power and authority to recall the same, if the person so licensed shall transgress any of the regulations or restrictions provided for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and shall put in suit such bonds as he may have taken, on the breach of any condition therein contained.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall attempt to trade with the Indian tribes, or shall be found in the Indian country, with such merchandise in his possession as are usually vended to the Indians, without lawful license, shall forfeit all the merchandise offered for sale to the Indians, or found in his possession in the Indian country, and shall, moreover, be liable to a fine, not exceeding one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment, not exceeding thirty days, at the discretion of the Court in which the trial shall be: Provided, That any citizen of the United States, merely traveling through any Indian town or territory, shall be at liberty to purchase, by exchange or otherwise, such articles as may be necessary for his subsistence, without incurring any penalty.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, if any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the Territorial districts of the United States, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit murder, robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crime, against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, or within the jurisdiction of either of the said districts, against a citizen thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such State or district, such offender shall be subject to the same punishment, as if the offence had been committed within the State or district to which he or she may belong, against a citizen thereof.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, if any such citizen or inhabitant shall make a settlement on lands belonging to any Indian tribe, or shall survey such lands, or designate their boundaries, by making trees, or otherwise, for the purpose of settlement, he shall forfeit a sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment, not exceeding twelve months, in the discretion of the Court before whom the trial shall be: and it shall, moreover, be lawful for the President of the United States to take such measures as he may judge necessary, to remove from lands belonging to any Indian tribe, any citizens or inhabitants of the United States, who have made, or shall hereafter make, or attempt to make, a settlement thereon.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be permitted to purchase any horse of an Indian, or of any white man in the Indian territory, without special license for that purpose; which license the Superintendent, or such other person as the President shall appoint, is hereby authorized to grant, on the same terms, conditions, and restrictions, as other licenses are to be granted under this act: Provided, also, That every person who shall purchase a horse or horses, under such license, before he exposes such horse or horses for sale, and within fifteen days after they shall have been brought out of the Indian country, shall make a particular return to the Superintendent, or other person from whom he obtained his license, of every horse by him purchased, as aforesaid, describing such horses by their color, height, and other natural or artificial marks, under the penalties contained in their respective bonds. And every person purchasing a horse or horses, as aforesaid, in the Indian country, without a special license, shall, for every horse thus purchased and brought into any settlement of citizens of the United States, forfeit, for every horse thus purchased, or brought from the Indian country, a sum not more than one hundred dollars, nor less than thirty dollars, to be recovered in any Court of Record having competent jurisdiction. And every person who shall purchase a horse, knowing him to be brought out of the Indian territory by any person or persons not licensed, as above, to purchase the same, shall forfeit the value of such horse; one-half for the benefit of the informant, the other half for the use of the United States, to be recovered as aforesaid.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no agent, superintendent, or other person, authorized to grant a license to trade, or purchase horses, shall have any interest or concern in any trade with the Indians, or in the purchase or sale of any horses, to or from any Indian; and that any person offending herein, shall forfeit one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned, at the discretion of the Court, before which the conviction shall be had, not exceeding twelve months.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no purchase or grant of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indians, or nation or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity, in law or equity, unless the same be made by a treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution: and it shall be a misdemeanor in any person, not employed under the authority of the United States in negotiating such treaty or convention, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, directly or indirectly to treat with any such Indians, nation, or tribe of Indians, for the title or purchase of any lands by them held or claimed: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the agent or agents of any State, who may be present at any treaty held with Indians, under the authority of the United States, in the presence, and with the approbation of the Commissioner or Commissioners of the United States appointed to hold the same, to propose to, and adjust with, the Indians, the compensation to be made for their claims to lands within such State, which shall be extinguished by the treaty.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in order to promote civilization among the friendly Indian tribes, and to secure the continuance of their friendship, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to cause them to be furnished with useful domestic animals and implements of husbandry, and also to furnish them with goods or money, in such proportions as he shall judge proper, and to appoint such persons, from time to time, as temporary agents, to reside among the Indians, as he shall think proper: Provided, That the whole amount of such presents, and allowance to such agents, shall not exceed twenty thousand dollars per annum.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Superior Courts of each of the said Territorial districts, and the Circuit Courts, and other Courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each district of the United States, into which any offender against this act shall be first brought, or in which he shall be apprehended, shall have, and are hereby invested with, full power and authority, to hear and determine all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, against this act; such Courts proceeding therein in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts: and in all cases where the punishment shall not be death, the County Courts of Quarter Sessions in the said Territorial districts, and the District Courts of the United States in their respective districts, shall have, and are hereby invested with, like power to hear and determine the same.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, and for the Governors of such Territorial districts, respectively, on proof to them made, that any citizen or citizens of the United States, or of the said districts, or either of them, have been guilty of any of the said crimes, offences, or misdemeanors, within any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, to cause such person or persons to be apprehended, and brought into either of the United States, or of the said districts, and to be proceeded against in due course of law. And in all cases where the punishment shall be death, it shall be lawful for the Governor of the district into which the offender may be first brought, or in which he may be apprehended, to issue a commission of Oyer and Terminer to the Superior Judges of the district, who shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all such capital cases, in the same manner as the Superior Courts of such districts have, in their ordinary sessions. And when the offender shall be brought into, or shall be apprehended in, any of the United States, except Kentucky, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to issue a like commission to any two Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Judge of the district, in which the offender may have been apprehended or first brought; which Judges, or any two of them, shall have the same jurisdiction, in such capital cases, as the Circuit Court of such district, and shall proceed to trial and judgment, in the same manner as such Circuit Court might or could do.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all fines and forfeitures, which shall accrue under this act, shall be, one-half to the use of the informant, and the other half to the use of the United States, except where the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States, and being within the jurisdiction of any of the individual States.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all and every other act and acts, coming within the purview of this act, shall be, and are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 1, 1793.

An Act to ascertain the Fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of May next, there shall not be taxed or adjudged to any officer or other person, any greater or other fee or reward, for or in respect of any service to be done or performed in any of the District Courts of the United States, in cases of Admiralty or maritime jurisdiction, than such as is hereinafter specified, that is to say:

Sales, for any sum under five hundred dollars, two and a half per cent.; and for any larger sum, one and a quarter per cent. upon the excess.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be allowed and taxed, in the Supreme, Circuit, and District Courts of the United States, in favor of the parties obtaining judgments therein, such compensation for their travel and attendance, and for attorneys and counsellors' fees, except in the District Courts in cases of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as are allowed in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the respective States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of one year, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

Approved, March 1, 1793.

An Act making an appropriation to defray the expense of a Treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, arising from the surplus of former appropriations, unexpended, shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to defraying the expense of negotiating and treating with the hostile Indian tribes Northwest of the river Ohio.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That each of the Commissioners who may be appointed for managing such negotiations and treaties, shall be entitled to an allowance, exclusive of his necessary expenses, of eight dollars per day, during his actual service, to be paid out of the moneys so appropriated.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act in addition to the Act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the attendance of only one of the Justices of the Supreme Court, at the several Circuit Courts of the United States, to be hereafter held, shall be sufficient, any law requiring the attendance of two of the said Justices notwithstanding: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the Supreme Court, in cases where special circumstances shall, in their judgment, render the same necessary, to assign two of the said Justices to attend the Circuit Court of Appeals, and it shall be the duty of the Justices so assigned, to attend accordingly: And provided also, That when only one Judge of the Supreme Court shall attend any Circuit Court, and the District Judge shall be absent, or shall have been of counsel, or be concerned in interest in any cause then pending, such Circuit Court may consist of the said Judge of the Supreme Court alone.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, if at any time only one Judge of the Supreme Court, and the Judge of the district, shall sit in a Circuit Court, and upon a final hearing of a cause, or of a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court, they shall be divided in opinion, it shall be continued to the succeeding Court; and if upon the second hearing, when a different Judge of the Supreme Court shall be present, a like division shall take place, the District Judge adhering to his former opinion, judgment shall be rendered in conformity to the opinion of the presiding Judge.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court, or, when the Supreme Court shall not be sitting, any one of the Justices thereof, together with the Judge of the district within which a special session, as hereafter authorized, shall be holden, may direct special sessions of the Circuit Courts to be holden, for the trial of criminal causes, at any convenient place within the district, nearer to the place where the offences may be said to be committed than the place or places appointed by law for the ordinary sessions: That the clerk of such Circuit Court shall, at least thirty days before the commencement of such special session, cause the time and place for holding the same to be notified, for at least three weeks successively, in one or more of the newspapers published nearest to the place where the session is to be holden: That all process, writs, and recognizances of every kind, whether respecting juries, witnesses, bail, or otherwise, which relate to the cases to be tried at the said special sessions, shall be considered as belonging to such sessions, in the same manner as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto: That any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the Circuit Court: That all business depending for trial at any special Court, shall, at the close thereof, be considered as of course removed to the next stated term of the Circuit Court: And that the District Courts of Maine and Kentucky shall have like power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes, as hath been heretofore given or is hereby given to the Circuit Courts, subject to the like regulations and restrictions.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That bail for appearance in any Court of the United States, in any criminal cause in which bail by law is allowed, may be taken by any Judge of the United States, any Chancellor, Judge of a Supreme or Superior Court, or chief or first Judge of a Court of Common Pleas of any State, or Mayor of a city in either of them, and by any person having authority from a Circuit Court, or the District Courts of Maine or Kentucky, to take bail; which authority, revocable at the discretion of such Court, any Circuit Court, or either of the District Courts of Maine or Kentucky, may give to one or more discreet persons, learned in the law, in any district for which such Court is holden, where, from the extent of the district, and remoteness of its parts from the usual residence of any of the before named officers, such provision shall, in the opinion of the Court, be necessary: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend to taking bail in any case where the punishment for the offence may be death; nor to abridge any power heretofore given by the laws of the United States to any description of persons to take bail.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That writs of ne exeat and of injunction may be granted by any Judge of the Supreme Court, in cases where they might be granted by the Supreme or a Circuit Court; but no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity be commenced, and satisfactory proof shall be made to the Court or Judge granting the same, that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States; nor shall a writ of injunction be granted to stay proceedings in any Court of a State; nor shall such writ be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That subpoenas for witnesses, who may be required to attend a Court of the United States, in any district thereof, may run into any other district: Provided, That in civil causes, the witnesses living out of the district in which the Court is holden, do not live at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of holding the same.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the several Courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective Courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up judgments by default, and other matters in the vacation, and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said Courts, respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That where it is now required by the laws of any State that goods taken in execution on a writ of fi fieri facias shall be appraised, previous to the sale thereof, it shall be lawful for the appraisers appointed under the authority of the State to appraise goods taken in execution, on a fi fieri facias issued out of any Court of the United States, in the same manner as if such writ had issued out of a Court held under the authority of the State; and it shall be the duty of the marshal in whose custody such goods may be to summon the appraisers, in like manner as the sheriff is, by the laws of the State, required to summon them; and the appraisers shall be entitled to the like fees, as in cases of appraisements under the laws of the State; and if the appraisers, being duly summoned, shall fail to attend and perform the duties required of them, the marshal may proceed to sell such goods without an appraisement.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act to alter the times and places of holding the Circuit Courts in the Eastern District, and in North Carolina, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Spring Circuit Courts of the Eastern District, instead of being held at the times and places now established by law for holding the same, shall, from henceforth, be held at the times and places following, respectively, namely: for the district of New York, at New York, on the fifth day of April; for the district of Connecticut, at New Haven, on the twenty-fifth day of April; for the district of Vermont at Windsor and Bennington alternately, beginning at the first, on the twelfth day of May; for the district of New Hampshire, at Portsmouth, on the twenty-seventh day of May; for the district of Massachusetts, at Boston, on the seventh day of June; and for the district of Rhode Island, at Newport, on the nineteenth day of June; and if any of the said days shall happen on a Sunday, the Courts, respectively, shall commence and be holden on the day following. And all causes now pending in the said Courts, and all appeals, processes, and recognizances, returned or returnable to the same, and all officers, jurors, parties, and witnesses, shall be conformable to this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the expiration of the session of the Circuit Court of the State of North Carolina, which is to commence on the first day of June next, (which session shall be held, anything in this act notwithstanding, at Newbern,) the stated sessions of the said Court shall be held at Wake Courthouse, either in the Court-house belonging to the said county, or in some convenient building contiguous thereto, until there shall be convenient accommodations for the said purpose in the city of Raleigh, in the said State; after which, and upon its being made so to appear to the said Court, the said Court is hereby authorized and directed, at the close of the session then depending, to adjourn the said Court, to meet at its next stated session in the city of Raleigh, which said city of Raleigh shall thereafter be the place at which the stated sessions of the said Court shall be constantly held.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, Inasmuch as there was not a sufficient quorum of Judges to hold the Circuit Court for the district of North Carolina, for the purpose of doing business, at November term, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, that it shall and may be lawful for the District Judge of the State of North Carolina, to direct the clerk of the said Court to issue such process for the purpose of having juries summoned to attend the said Court, at the term to commence on the first day of June next, as he had before issued for the like purpose, returnable to November term above mentioned; that the jury-men ordered by the said process to be summoned shall be ordered to be summoned in the same proportion, and from the same counties, as those jury-men who were ordered to be summoned by the process returnable at November term above mentioned; and the marshal is to execute the said process, and the jury-men legally summoned in consequence thereof are to attend the said Court, under the like penalties for disobedience, as if the said process had been ordered to be issued as usual by the said Court; and the marshal and the jury-men who attend at the said Court shall be entitled to the like allowance for their services respectively. And it is hereby declared that all suits and proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, which have been commenced in the said Court and not finished, shall be proceeded on at the ensuing term, in the same manner and to the same effect, as if the said Circuit Court had been regularly held at November term, as aforesaid, and continuances had been regularly held of all such suits and proceedings from the said last mentioned term to the ensuing term.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act supplementary to the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the Collection of the Duties imposed by law on Goods, Wares, and Merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the Tonnage of Ships or Vessels."

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be in the State of Georgia a district, to be called the district of Hardwick, to comprehend all the waters, shores, bays, harbors, creeks, and rivers, between the South point of Ossabow island and the South point of Warsaw island; that in the said district of the town of Hardwick shall be the only port of entry; and a collector for said district shall be appointed to reside at Hardwick; and the said collector shall be entitled to receive the like fees and the same yearly allowance which is paid to the collector of the district of St. Mary's, in the said State.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of Lake Champlain, with the shores, bays, and rivers, connected therewith as lieth within the State of New York, shall be one entire district, to be called the district of Champlain; and the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint such place, within said district, to be the port of entry and delivery within the same as he may deem expedient; and a collector for the said district shall be appointed, to reside at such place within said district as the President of the United States shall direct, who shall be allowed the same fees as are allowed to the collector in the district of Vermont: Provided, nevertheless, That the exception contained in the sixty-ninth section of the act above mentioned, relative to the district of Louisville, shall be, and hereby is, extended to the district of Champlain.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the collectors in the districts of Vermont and Champlain, in addition to the fees and emoluments which may accrue to them in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage by the provisions already made, shall severally have, and be entitled to receive, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars each.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the allowance of one-half per centum to the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and of the city of New York, and the allowance of one per centum to the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charleston and of Baltimore on the amount of all the moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties of impost and tonnage shall cease, and, instead thereof, from and after the said last day of June next, the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and of the city of New York shall be entitled to three-eighths of one per centum, and the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charleston and of Baltimore shall be entitled to three-fourths of one per centum on all such moneys by them respectively received.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of January next, no officer of the customs, or other person employed under the authority of the United States, in the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, shall own, in whole or in part, any ship or vessel, or act as agent, attorney, or consignee, for the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or of any cargo or lading on board the same; nor shall any officer of the customs, or other person employed in the collection of the duties as aforesaid, import, or be concerned, directly or indirectly, in the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, into the United States, on penalty that every person so offending, and being thereof convicted, shall forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the twelfth section of an act entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," as restricted all officers of the United States employed in the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, from buying or disposing of the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or of any public property of either, be and the same is hereby repealed, so far as the same prohibits them from disposing of their interest in the funds or debts of the United States, or of any of the said States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, if he shall judge it conducive to the public interest, increase the complement of mariners to the several revenue-cutters, so that the number do not exceed seven mariners to each cutter; and that, from and after the first day of April next, there be allowed, in lieu of the compensations now established, to the master of each revenue-cutter, forty dollars per month and the subsistence of a Captain in the Army of the United States; to a first mate, twenty-six dollars per month; to a second mate, twenty dollars per month; to a third mate, eighteen dollars per month; to every mate, the subsistence of a Lieutenant of the said Army; and to each mariner, not exceeding ten dollars per month, to be paid by the collectors of the revenue who shall be designated for that purpose. And that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the supply of rations for the officers and men of the said cutters, on such terms as shall, from time to time, appear reasonable.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act providing for the payment of the first instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply two hundred thousand dollars of the moneys which may have been borrowed in pursuance of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," in payment of the first instalment due to the Bank of the United States upon a loan made of the said Bank, in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act for incorporating the subscribers to the said Bank.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act for extending the time for Receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which shall not have been subscribed in pursuance of the act, entitled, "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," be extended, from and after the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, until the last day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusively, on the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States." Provided, That the books for receiving the said subscriptions shall be opened only at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed, and shall not subscribe to the said Loan, shall, nevertheless, receive, during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, a rate per centum on the amount of such of their demands as shall have been registered, conformable to the directions contained in the said act, on or before the last day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, equal to the interest which would be payable to them as subscribing creditors.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers.

Be it enacted, &c., That all expenses which shall accrue, from the first day of July next, inclusively, for the necessary support, maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, the stake-ages of channels on the sea-coast, and public piers, shall continue to be defrayed by the United States, until the first day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, notwithstanding such light-houses, beacons, or public piers, with the lands and tenements thereunto belonging, and the jurisdiction of the same, shall not, in the meantime, be ceded to or vested in the United States by the State or States, respectively, in which the same may be; and that the said time be further allowed to the States respectively to make such cession.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause a floating beacon or buoy to be provided and placed on Smith's Point shoal, in the Chesapeake Bay, and a beacon or floating buoy at the Southwest Straddle, on the Royal Shoal, near Ocracoke Inlet, in North Carolina.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer.

Be it enacted, &c., That an annual allowance to be made for the education of Hugh Mercer, son of the late General Mercer, pursuant to the resolution of the former Congress of the date of the eighth of April, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, shall be four hundred dollars from the time for which he has been last paid until his education shall be finished, or he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. And, that the Comptroller of the Treasury be authorized to revise and settle the account of the said Hugh Mercer, for his pension to the present time; the balance of which, as also the annual allowances aforesaid, as they shall become due, shall be paid to his guardian at the Treasury.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act making certain Appropriations therein mentioned.

PROCEEDINGS

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE THIRD CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 2, 1793.

NOTE TO THE READER.

To account for the absence of any Report of Debates in the Senate in the Third Congress, it is proper here to repeat that the Senate sat with closed doors during its Legislative as well as its Executive sittings, from the beginning of the first Congress up to the 20th day of February, 1794, when a proposition succeeded, which had frequently before failed, in that body, that the Legislative sittings of the Senate should thenceforth, after the end of that session of Congress, be conducted with open doors and galleries.

MONDAY, December 2, 1793.

This being the day fixed by the Constitution for the annual meeting of Congress, the following members of the Senate appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats:

JOHN ADAMS, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate;

JOHN LANGDON and SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from New Hampshire;

GEORGE CABOT, from Massachusetts;

OLIVER ELLSWORTH, from Connecticut;

MOSES ROBINSON, from Vermont;

AARON BURR, from New York;

JOHN RUTHERFORD, from New Jersey;

ROBERT MORRIS and ALBERT GALLATIN, from Pennsylvania;

JAMES MONROE, from Virginia;

JOHN EDWARDS, from Kentucky;

BENJAMIN HAWKINS, from North Carolina;

RALPH IZARD, from South Carolina.

Mr. LANGDON, the President of the Senate pro tempore, administered the oath required by law to the Vice President of the UNITED STATES.

The Secretary read the credentials of the following Senators appointed for the terms respectively mentioned therein:

PIERCE BUTLER, from South Carolina;

ALEXANDER MARTIN, from North Carolina;

JOHN VINING, from Delaware.

The Vice President administered the oath required by law to Mr. BUTLER, Mr. GALLATIN, and Mr. MARTIN, respectively, and they took their seats.

STEPHEN MIX MITCHELL, appointed by the State of Connecticut a Senator for two years, in the place of ROGER SHERMAN, deceased, produced his credentials, which being read, the Vice President administered to him the oath required by law, and he took his seat.

The Vice President laid before the Senate the petition of Conrad Laub and others, relative to the appointment of Mr. GALLATIN, a Senator of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Vice President also communicated a letter from George Reim, of Delaware, resigning his seat in the Senate; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. IZARD and LANGDON be a joint committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint, on their part, to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House had elected FREDERICK A. MUEHLBERG their Speaker, and that they have concurred with the Senate in appointing a joint committee to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES.

Mr. IZARD, from the joint committee who had waited on the President, reported that the President would meet the two Houses to-morrow, at 13 o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

TUESDAY, December 3.

The two Houses being assembled in the Senate Chamber, the President of the UNITED STATES entered, and addressed the two Houses of Congress as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Since the commencement of the term for which I have been again called into office, no fit occasion has arisen for expressing to my fellow-citizens at large the deep and respectful sense which I feel of the renewed testimony of public approbation. While, on the one hand, it awakened my gratitude for all those instances of affectionate partiality with which I have been honored by my country, on the other, it could not prevent an earnest wish for that retirement from which no private consideration should ever have torn me. But, influenced by the belief that my conduct would be estimated according to its real motives, and that the people, and the authorities derived from them, would support exertions having nothing personal for their object, I have obeyed the suffrage which commanded me to resume the Executive power, and I humbly implore that Being on whose will the fate of nations depends, to crown with success our mutual endeavors for the general happiness.

As soon as the war in Europe had embraced those Powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations, there was reason to apprehend that our intercourse with them might be interrupted, and our disposition for peace drawn into question by the suspicions too often entertained by belligerent nations. It seemed, therefore, to be my duty to admonish our citizens of the consequences of a contraband trade, and of hostile acts to any of the parties, and to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation. Under these impressions, the Proclamation which will be laid before you was issued.

In this posture of affairs, both new and delicate, I resolved to adopt general rules, which should conform to the treaties and assert the privileges of the United States. These were reduced into a system, which will be communicated to you. Although I have not thought myself at liberty to forbid the sale of the prizes permitted by our treaty of commerce with France to be brought into our ports, I have not refused to cause them to be restored when they were taken within the protection of our territory, or by vessels commissioned or equipped in a warlike form within the limits of the United States.

It rests with the wisdom of Congress to correct, improve, or enforce this plan of procedure; and it will probably be found expedient to extend the legal code and the jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States to many cases which, though dependent on principles already recognized, demand some further provisions.

Where individuals shall, within the United States, array themselves in hostility against any of the Powers at war, or enter upon military expeditions or enterprises within the jurisdiction of the United States; or usurp and exercise judicial authority within the United States; or where the penalties on violations of the law of nations may have been indistinctly marked, or are inadequate—these offences cannot receive too early and close an attention, and require prompt and decisive remedies.

Whatever those remedies may be, they will be well administered by the Judiciary, who possess a long-established course of investigation, effectual process, and officers in the habit of executing it.

In like manner, as several of the Courts have doubted, under particular circumstances, their power to liberate the vessels of a nation at peace, and even of a citizen of the United States, although seized under a false color of being hostile property, and have denied their power to liberate certain captures within the protection of our territory, it would seem proper to regulate their jurisdiction in these points; but, if the Executive is to be the resort in either of the two last-mentioned cases, it is hoped that he will be authorized by law to have facts ascertained by the Courts, when, for his own information, he shall request it.

I cannot recommend to your notice measures for the fulfilment of our duties to the rest of the world, without again pressing upon you the necessity of placing ourselves in a condition of complete defence, and of exerting from them the fulfilment of their duties towards us. The United States ought not to indulge a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every other nation abounds. There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war. The documents which will be presented to you will show the amount and kinds of arms and military stores now in our magazines and arsenals; and yet an addition even to these supplies cannot with prudence be neglected, as it would leave nothing to the uncertainty of procuring of warlike apparatus in the moment of public danger.

Nor can such arrangements, with such objects, be exposed to the censure or jealousy of the warmest friends of Republican Government. They are incapable of abuse in the hands of the Militia, who ought to possess a pride in being the depository of the force of the Republic, and may be trained to a degree of energy equal to every military exigency of the United States. But it is an inquiry which cannot be too solemnly pursued, whether the act "more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States," has organized them so as to produce their full effect; whether your own experience in the several States has not detected some imperfections in the scheme; and whether a material feature, in an improvement of it, ought not to be to afford an opportunity for the study of those branches of the military art which can scarcely ever be attained by practice alone!

The connexion of the United States with Europe has become extremely interesting. The occurrences which relate to it and have passed under the knowledge of the Executive, will be exhibited to Congress in a subsequent communication.

When we contemplate the war on our frontiers, it may be truly affirmed that every reasonable effort has been made to adjust the causes of dissension with the Indians north of the Ohio. The instructions given to the Commissioners evince a moderation and equity proceeding from a sincere love of peace and a liberality having no restriction but the essential interest and dignity of the United States. The attempt, however, of an amicable negotiation having been frustrated, the troops have marched to act offensively. Although the proposed treaty did not arrest the progress of military preparation, it is doubtful how far the advance of the season, before good faith justified active movements, may retard them, during the remainder of the year. From the papers and intelligence which relate to this important subject, you will determine whether the deficiency in the number of troops granted by law shall be compensated by succors of Militia, or additional encouragements shall be proposed to recruits.

An anxiety has been also demonstrated by the Executive for peace with the Greeks and the Cherokees. The former have been relieved with corn and with clothing, and offensive measures against them prohibited during the recess of Congress. To satisfy the complaints of the latter, prosecutions have been instituted for the violence committed upon them. But the papers which will be delivered to you, disclose the critical footing on which we stand in regard to both those tribes, and it is with Congress to pronounce what shall be done.

After they shall have provided for the present emergency, it will merit their most serious labors to render tranquility with the savages permanent, by creating ties of interest. Next to a rigorous execution of justice on the violators of peace, the establishment of commerce with the Indian nations in behalf of the United States, is most likely to conciliate their attachment. But it ought to be conducted without fraud, without extortion, with constant and plentiful supplies, and a stated market for the commodities of the Indians, and a stated price for what they give in payment and receive in exchange. Individuals will not pursue such a traffic, unless they be allured by the hope of profit; but it will be enough for the United States to be reimbursed only. Should this recommendation accord with the opinion of Congress, they will recollect that it cannot be accomplished by any means yet in the hands of the Executive.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The Commissioners charged with the settlement of accounts between the United States and individual States concluded their important functions within the time limited by law, and the balances struck in their Report (which will be laid before Congress) have been placed on the books of the Treasury.

On the first day of June last, an instalment of one million of florins became payable on the Loans of the United States in Holland. This was adjusted by a prolongation of the period of reimbursement, in nature of a new Loan, at an interest of five per cent., for the term of ten years, and the expenses of this operation were a commission of three per cent.

The first instalment of the Loan of two millions of dollars from the Bank of the United States has been paid, as was directed by law. For the second it is necessary that provision should be made.

No pecuniary consideration is more urgent than the regular redemption and discharge of the Public Debt; on none can delay be more injurious, or an economy of time more valuable.

The productiveness of the public revenues hitherto has continued to equal the anticipations which were formed of it, but it is not expected to prove commensurate with all the objects which have been suggested. Some auxiliary provisions will, therefore, it is presumed, be requisite; and it is hoped that these may be made consistently with a due regard to the convenience of our citizens, who cannot but be sensible of the true wisdom of encountering a small present addition to their contributions, to obviate a future accumulation of burdens.

But here I cannot forbear to recommend a repeal of the tax on the transportation of public prints. There is no resource so firm for the Government of the United States as the affections of the people guided by an enlightened policy; and to this primary good nothing can conduce more than a faithful representation of public proceedings, diffused without restraint, throughout the United States.

An estimate of the appropriations necessary for the current service of the ensuing year, and a statement of the purchase of arms and military stores, made during the recess, will be presented to Congress.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The several subjects to which I have now referred open a wide range to your deliberations, and involve some of the choicest interests of our common country. Permit me to bring to your remembrance the magnitude of your task. Without an unprejudiced coolness, the welfare of the Government may be hazarded; without harmony, as far as consists with freedom of sentiment, its dignity may be lost. But as the Legislative proceedings of the United States, will never, I trust, be reproached for the want of candor or of candor, so shall not the public happiness languish from the want of my strenuous and warmest co-operation.

G. WASHINGTON.

PHILADELPHIA, December 2, 1793.

The PRESIDENT having retired, the two Houses separated.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have resolved that two Chaplains of different denominations, be appointed for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly; to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate concurred with the above proposition, and appointed the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE to be Chaplain on the part of the Senate.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, communicating his Proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, together with the Rules established by the PRESIDENT for the government of the Executive Officers, in cases of vessels equipping in the ports of the United States.

The Proclamation and Rules were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, a committee of five was appointed to report the draft of an Address to the PRESIDENT, in answer to his Speech to both Houses.

MESSRS. ELLSWORTH, BUTLER, IZARD, LANGDON, and RUTHERFORD, were named.

WEDNESDAY, December 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of War, with sundry papers therein referred to; which Letter and papers were, in part, read, and the Senate then adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 5.

FREDERICK FREELINGHUYSEN, from New Jersey, appeared, produced his credentials, and the usual oath being administered to him, took his seat.

The reading of the papers yesterday received from the Secretary of War was resumed; and, after progress, postponed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

As the present situation of the several nations of Europe, and especially of those with which the United States have important relations, cannot but render the state of things between them and us matter of interesting inquiry to the Legislature, and may indeed give rise to deliberations to which they alone are competent, I have thought it my duty to communicate to them certain correspondences which have taken place.

The Representative and Executive bodies of France have manifested generally a friendly attachment to this country, have given advantages to our commerce and navigation, and have made overtures for placing these advantages on permanent ground. A decree, however, of the National Assembly, subjecting vessels laden with provisions to be carried into their ports, and making every goods lawful prize in the vessel of a friend, contrary to our Treaty, though revoked at one time as to the United States, has been since extended to their vessels also, as has been recently stated to us. Representations on this subject will be immediately given in charge to our Minister there, and the result shall be communicated to the Legislature.

It is with extreme concern I have to inform you that the proceedings of the person whom they have unfortunately appointed their Minister Plenipotentiary here have breathed nothing of the friendly spirit of the nation which sent him; their tendency, on the contrary, has been to involve us in war abroad and discord and anarchy at home. So far as his acts, or those of his agents, have threatened our immediate commitment in the war, or flagrant insult to the authority of the laws, or the effect has been counteracted by the ordinary cognizance of the laws, and by an exertion of the powers confided to me. Where their danger was not imminent, they have been borne with, from sentiments of regard to his nation, from a sense of their friendship towards us, from a conviction that they would not suffer us to remain long exposed to the action of a person who has so little respected our mutual dispositions, and, I will add, from a reliance on the firmness of my fellow-citizens in their principles of peace and order. In the mean time, I have respected and pursued the stipulations of our treaties, according to what I judged their true sense, and have withheld no act of friendship which their affairs have called for from us, and which justice to others left us free to perform. I have gone further: rather than employ force for the restitution of certain vessels, which I deemed the United States bound to restore, I thought it more advisable to satisfy the parties by avowing it to be my opinion that, if restitution were not made, it would be incumbent on the United States to make compensation. The papers now communicated will more particularly apprise you of these transactions.

The vexations and spoliation undertaken to have been committed on our vessels and commerce by the cruizers and officers of some of the belligerent Powers, appeared to require attention. The proofs of these, however, not having been brought forward, the descriptions of citizens supposed to have suffered were notified that, on furnishing them to the Executive, due measures would be taken to obtain redress of the past, and more effectual provisions against the future. Should such documents be furnished, proper representations will be made thereon, with a just reliance on a redress proportioned to the exigency of the case.

The British Government having undertaken, by orders to the commanders of their armed vessels, to restrain generally our commerce in corn and other provisions to their own ports, and those of their friends, the instructions now communicated were immediately forwarded to our Minister at that Court. In the mean time some discussions on the subject took place between him and them. These are also laid before you, and I may expect to learn the result of his special instructions in time to make it known to the Legislature during their present session.

Very early after the arrival of a British Minister here mutual explanations on the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace were entered into with that Minister. These are now laid before you for your information.

On the subjects of mutual interest between this country and Spain, negotiations and conferences are now depending. The public good requiring that the present state of these should be made known to the Legislature in confidence only, they shall be the subject of a separate and subsequent communication.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, December 5, 1793.

The Message and papers therein referred to were, in part, read, and the further reading postponed.

The following: Report of the Commissioners appointed to execute the several acts of Congress to provide more effectually for the settlement of the Accounts between the United States and the individual States, report:

The Commissioners appointed to execute the several acts of Congress to provide more effectually for the settlement of the Accounts between the United States and the individual States, report:

That they have maturely considered the claims of the several States against the United States, and the charges of the United States against the individual States.

That they have gone through the process prescribed in the fifth section of the act of Congress passed the 5th day of August, 1790, (the particulars whereof will be found in book A, lodged with the papers of this office, in the Treasury Department,) and find that there is due, including interest, to the 31st day of December, 1789, to the State of—

New Hampshire, seventy-five thousand and fifty-five dollars;

Massachusetts, one million two hundred and forty-eight thousand eight hundred and one dollars;

Rhode Island, two hundred and ninety-nine thousand six hundred and eleven dollars;

Connecticut, six hundred and nineteen thousand one hundred and twenty-one dollars;

New Jersey, forty-nine thousand and thirty dollars;

South Carolina, one million two hundred and five thousand nine hundred and seventy-eight dollars;

Georgia, nineteen thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight dollars.

And that there is due, including interest, to the 31st day of December, 1789, from the State of—

New York, two million and seventy-four thousand eight hundred and forty-six dollars;

Pennsylvania, seventy-six thousand seven hundred and nine dollars;

Delaware, six hundred and twelve thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars;

Maryland, one hundred and fifty-one thousand six hundred and forty dollars;

Virginia, one hundred thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine dollars;

North Carolina, five hundred and one thousand and eighty-two dollars.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF ACCOUNTS,
Philadelphia, June 29, 1793.

FRIDAY, December 6.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they had elected the Rev. ASHBEL GREEN as Chaplain to Congress, on their part.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee appointed to report the draft of an address to the President of the UNITED STATES, made a report; which was read, and ordered for consideration on Monday next.

The Senate resumed the reading of the communications referred to in the Message of the PRESIDENT of the 5th instant; and, after progress, adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 9.

Messrs. STEPHEN R. BRADLEY, from Vermont, THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island, and Rufus KING, from New York, appeared and took their seats.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Letter of the 7th instant, from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, with his quarterly accounts, made up to the 31st of March last, together with his accounts respecting the Department of War, made up to the 30th of June last.

The Letter was read.

Ordered, That the Letter and papers therein referred to lie on the table.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the draft of an Address reported by the committee in answer to the Speech of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to Congress at the opening of the session; which, being amended, and the several paragraphs of the report agreed to, it was adopted, as follows:

"To the President of the United States:

"Accept, sir, the thanks of the Senate for your Speech delivered to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the session. Your re-election to the Chief Magistracy of the United States gives us sincere pleasure. We consider it as an event every way propitious to the happiness of our country; and your compliance with the call, as a fresh instance of the patriotism which has so repeatedly led you to sacrifice private inclination to the public good. In the unanimity which a second time marks this important national act, we trace, with particular satisfaction, besides the distinguished tribute paid to the virtues and abilities which it recognises, another proof of that just discernment and constancy of sentiments and views which have hitherto characterized the citizens of the United States.

"As the European Powers with whom the United States have the most extensive relations were involved in war, in which we had taken no part, it seemed necessary that the disposition of the nation for peace should be promulgated to the world, as well for the purpose of admonishing our citizens of the consequences of a contraband trade and of acts hostile to any of the belligerent parties, as to obtain, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities of our situation; we, therefore, contemplate with pleasure the proclamation by you issued, and give it our hearty approbation. We deem it a measure well-timed and wise, manifesting a watchful solicitude for the welfare of the nation, and calculated to promote it.

"The several important matters presented to our consideration will, in the course of the session, engage all the attention to which they are respectively entitled; and, as the public happiness will be the sole guide of our deliberations, we are perfectly assured of receiving your strenuous and most zealous co-operation.

JOHN ADAMS,
and President of the Senate."

Ordered, That Messrs. ELLSWORTH and BOTTLER wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that the foregoing address should be presented.

TUESDAY, December 10.

JOHN BROWN, from the State of Kentucky, attended to-day.

Mr. ELLSWORTH reported, from the committee appointed yesterday to wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, that the PRESIDENT proposed to receive the Address of the Senate this day, at 12 o'clock, at his own house. Whereupon, the Senate waited on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and the VICE PRESIDENT, in their name, presented the address agreed to on the 9th instant. To this Address the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES was pleased to make the following Reply:

"GENTLEMEN: The pleasure expressed by the Senate on my re-election to the station which I fill, commands my sincere and warmest acknowledgments. If this be an event which promises the smallest addition to the happiness of our country, as it is my duty, so shall it be my study, to realize the expectation.

"The decided approbation which the Proclamation now receives from your House, by completing the proofs that this measure is considered as manifesting a vigilant attention to the welfare of the United States, brings with it a peculiar gratification to my mind.

"The other important subjects which have been communicated to you will, I am confident, receive a due discussion; and the result will, I trust, prove fortunate to the United States.

"G. WASHINGTON."

The Senate then returned to their Chamber, and resumed the reading of the papers communicated in the Message of the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES of the 5th instant, but adjourned before they were got through.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

CARLEB STRONG, from Massachusetts, attended to-day.

The credentials of Mr. BROWN and Mr. STRONG were read, the usual oath administered to them, and they took their seats.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, with his specie account, made up to the 30th of June last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That Messrs. RUTHERFORD, CABOT, ELLSWORTH, LIVERMORE, and MITCHELL, be a committee to take into consideration the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that the Hon. ALBERT GALLATIN, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution, and report thereon to the Senate.

The Senate resumed the reading of the papers referred to in the Message of the President of the UNITED STATES of the 5th instant; and, after progress, adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 13.

WILLIAM BEADFORD, from Rhode Island, and JOHN TAYLOR, from Virginia, attended, produced their credentials, and took the usual oath and their seats.

The Senate resumed the reading of the papers communicated with the Message of the President on the 5th instant; and the Message and papers therein referred to were ordered to lie for consideration.

MONDAY, December 16.

JAMES JACKSON, from Georgia, attended, produced his credentials, and, the oath required by law being administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

The Communications from the Secretary of the Department of War, of the 4th instant, were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of the Department of War, with a return of the ordinance, arms, and military stores, in possession of the United States, together with a variety of papers, giving a view of the Creek Indians and the State of Georgia, and the Southwestern territory of the United States and the Cherokee; which Letter was read.

Ordered, That the Letter and papers therein referred to lie on the table.

The following Messages were received from the President of the UNITED STATES, and read:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The situation of affairs in Europe, in the course of the year 1790, having rendered it possible that a moment might arrive favorable for the arrangement of our unsettled matters with Spain, it was thought proper to prepare our Representative at that Court to avail us of it. A confidential person was therefore despatched to be the bearer of instructions to him, and to supply, by verbal communications, any additional information of which he might find himself in need. The Government of France was, at the same time, applied to for its aid and influence in this negotiation. Events, however, took a turn which did not present the occasion hoped for.

About the close of the ensuing year I was informed, through the Representatives of Spain here, that their Government would be willing to renew at Madrid the former conferences on these subjects. Though the transfer of scene was not what would have been desired, yet I did not think it important enough to reject the proposition; and, therefore, with the advice and consent of the Senate, I appointed Commissioners Plenipotentiary for negotiating and concluding a Treaty with that country, on the several subjects of boundary, navigation, and commerce, and gave them the instructions now communicated. Before these negotiations, however, could be got into train, the new troubles which had arisen in Europe had produced new combinations among the Powers there, the effects of which are but too visible in the proceedings now laid before you. In the meantime some other points of discussion had arisen with that country, to wit: the restitution of property escaping into the territories of each other, the mutual exchange of fugitives from justice, and, above all, the mutual interferences with the Indians lying between us. I had the best reason to believe that the hostilities threatened and exercised by the Southern Indians on our border were excited by the agents of that Government. Representations were thereon directed to be made by our Commissioners to the Spanish Government, and a proposal to cultivate, with good faith, the peace of each other with those people. In the mean time corresponding suspicions were entertained, or pretended to be entertained on their part, of like hostile excitement by our agents to disturb their peace with the same nations. These were brought forward by the Representatives of Spain here, in a style which could not fail to produce attention. A claim of patronage and protection of those Indians was asserted; a mediation between them and us by that Sovereign assumed; their boundaries with us made a subject of his interference; and, at length, at the very moment when these savages were committing daily incursions upon our frontier, we were informed by them that "the continuation of the peace, good harmony, and perfect friendship of the two nations was very problematical for the future, unless the United States should take more convenient measures, and of greater energy, than those adopted for a long time past."

If their previous correspondence had worn the appearance of a desire to urge on a disagreement, this last declaration left no room to evade it, since it could not be conceived we would submit to the scalping knife and tomahawk of the savage without any resistance. I thought it time, therefore, to know if these were the views of their Sovereign, and despatched a special messenger with instructions to our Commissioners, which are among the papers now communicated. Their last letter gives us reason to expect very shortly to know the result. I must add that the Spanish Representatives here, perceiving that their last communication had made considerable impression, endeavored to abate this by some subsequent professions, which, being also among the communications to the Legislature, they will be able to form their own conclusions.

UNITED STATES, December 16, 1793.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a Report of the Secretary of State on the measures which have been taken on behalf of the United States for the purpose of obtaining a recognition of our treaty with Morocco, and for the ransom of our citizens, and establishment of peace with Algiers.

While it is proper our citizens should know that subjects which so much concern their interests and their feelings have duly engaged the attention of their Legislature and Executive, it would still be improper that some particulars of this communication should be made known. The confidential conversation stated in one of the last letters, sent herewith, is one of these. Both justice and policy require that the source of that information should remain secret. So a knowledge of the sums meant to have been given for peace and ransom might have a disadvantageous influence on future proceedings for the same objects.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 16, 1793.

These Messages were ordered to lie for consideration.

The Vice President laid before the Senate the following Report, to wit:

"The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, respectfully report to Congress, as follows:

"That, pursuant to the act entitled 'An act making further provision for the reduction of the Public Debt,' and in conformity to resolutions agreed upon by them, and in conformity approved by the President of the United States, they have, since their report of the 17th of November, 1792, caused purchases of the said Debt to be made, through the agency of Samuel Meredith and Jonathan Burrall, respectively, to the amount of $523,735 21 in stock, for which there have been paid, in specie, $426,842 75. That, pursuant to the act entitled 'An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States,' and in conformity to resolutions agreed upon by them, and severally approved by the President of the United States, they have also caused purchases of the said Debt to be made subsequent to their said report of the 17th of November, 1792, to the amount of $122,838 14 in stock, for which there have been paid $75,660 87, in specie. That the several documents accompanying this report marked Aa, Ba, and Nos. 1 to 7, with their enclosures, show the aforesaid purchases, generally and in detail, including the places where, the time when, the prices at which, and the persons to whom, they have been made. That the purchases now and heretofore reported amount, together, to $2,019,193 10 in stock, for which there have been paid $1,394,664 40, in specie, as will be more particularly seen by the document aforesaid marked Aa. On behalf of the Board:

"JOHN ADAMS.

FRIDAY, December 20.

The Senate resumed the reading of the Communications from the Secretary of the Department of War on the 16th instant, relative to further information respecting the Southwestern frontiers; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, December 23.

Mr. BRADLEY notified the Senate that, on Wednesday next, he should move for leave to bring in a bill for altering the Flag of the United States.

The Senate resumed the reading of the Communications from the Secretary of the Department of War, on the 16th instant, relative to further information respecting the Southwestern frontiers; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 24.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

"Since the communications which were made to you on the affairs of the United States with Spain, and on the truce between Portugal and Algiers, some other papers have been received, which, making a part of the same subjects, are now communicated for your information."

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 23, 1793.

The Message and papers referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. BUTLER notified the Senate that he should, on some day the next week, request leave to bring in a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States."

The following motion was made and seconded, to wit: That the Constitution be amended by adding, at the end of the ninth section of the first article, the following clause:

"Nor shall any person holding any office or stock in any institution in the nature of a Bank for issuing or discounting bills or notes payable to bearer or order, under the authority of the United States, be a member of either House whilst he holds such office or stock; but no power to grant any charter of incorporation, or any commercial or other monopoly, shall be herein implied."

And it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

Ordered, That Messrs. STRONG, ELLSWORTH, and KING, be a committee to take into consideration that part of the President's Speech which recommends a further provision against offences.

The Senate resumed the reading of the communications from the Secretary of the Department of War of the 16th instant, relative to further information respecting the Southwestern frontiers; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned to Thursday next.

THURSDAY, December 26.

Agreeably to notice given on the 23d instant, Mr. BRADLEY obtained leave to bring in a bill making an alteration in the Flag of the United States; and the bill was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate resumed the reading of the communications from the Secretary of the Department of War of the 16th instant, relative to further information respecting the Southwestern frontiers; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 27.

The petition of James and William Smith, of the State of Georgia, for themselves, and in behalf of the heirs of James Smith, was presented and read, praying for remedy and assistance in respect to certain losses sustained by the Creek Indians.

Ordered, That this petition, together with the communications, from the Secretary of the Department of War, respecting Indian Affairs, be referred to Messrs. JACKSON, STRONG, BURR, BUTLER, and LANGDON, to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, December 31.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a Letter from the Secretary of State, informing me of certain impediments which have arisen to the coinage of the precious metals at the Mint.

As also a Letter from the same officer, relative to certain advances of money which have been made on public account. Should you think proper to sanction what has been done, or be of opinion that any thing more shall be done in the same way, you will judge whether there are not circumstances which would render secrecy expedient.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1793.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I communicate to you the translation of a Letter received from the Representatives of Spain here, in reply to that of the Secretary of State to them, of the 21st instant, which had before been communicated to you.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1793.

The Messages and papers therein referred to were severally read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. RUTHERFORD reported, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that the Hon. ALBERT GALLATIN, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution; which report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, January 1, 1794.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others.

On motion to postpone the consideration of the report until to-morrow, it was agreed to amend this motion, by striking out the words "to-morrow," and to insert, in lieu thereof, "Thursday, the 9th instant."

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I now lay before you a Letter from the Secretary of State, with his account of the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for our intercourse with foreign nations from the 1st of July, 1792, to the 1st of July, 1793, and other papers relating thereto.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 31, 1793.

The Message and papers therein referred to were severally read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, January 2.

A motion was made that it be—

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

On which a motion was made as follows:

"Resolved, That the consideration of this motion be postponed, and that the Senate will, on the 10th instant, take into consideration the subject of amendments to the Constitution."

Whereupon it was agreed to divide the motion for amendment, and the first clause was adopted, to wit:

"That the consideration of the original motion be postponed."

And, the latter clause of the motion for postponement being amended, it was

Resolved, That the Senate will, on the 13th instant, take into consideration the subject of amendments to the Constitution.

FRIDAY, January 3.

A motion was made and seconded, that the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate the following returns, to wit:

A statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the several States from the 1st of July, 1792, to the 1st of July, 1793, specifying the quantities and value of each kind, and the several countries to which the same have respectively been exported.

A statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the several States for the same period, specifying the quantities and the prime cost, and dutied value of each kind, and the several countries from which the same have respectively been imported.

A statement of the tonnage of foreign vessels entered into the several States during the same period, specifying the several countries to which the said vessels respectively belong.

A statement of the tonnage of the United States' vessels entered into the several States during the same period, distinguishing those employed in fisheries, in the coasting and in the foreign trade, and specifying the several countries from which the said vessels employed in said trade came.

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

MONDAY, January 6.

The Senate met to-day, but done no business.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

Experience has shown that it would be useful to have an officer particularly charged, under the direction of the Department of War, with the duties of receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing the public supplies, in all cases in which the laws and the course of service do not devolve them upon other officers; and, also, with that of superintending, in all cases, the issues, in detail, of supplies, with power, for that purpose, to bring to account all persons intrusted to make such issues, in relation thereto.

An establishment of this nature, by securing a regular and punctual accountability for the issues of public supplies, would be a great guard against abuse, would tend to insure their due application, and to give public satisfaction on that point.

I therefore recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an establishment of this nature, under such regulations as shall appear to them advisable.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 7, 1794.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year 1793, from the sum of ten thousand dollars, granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by an act passed on the 26th of March, 1790.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 7, 1794.

The Messages and paper referred to in the last-recited Message, were severally read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, January 8.

Ordered, That the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, respecting the usefulness of an officer particularly charged with the duties of receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing the public supplies in certain cases, be referred to Messrs. ELLSWORTH, TAYLOR, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The following motion was made and seconded:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury do lay before this House the following statements, to wit:

First. A statement of the Domestic Debt of the United States, as due on the 1st day of January, 1794, specifying under distinct heads—

1st. The Funded Debt, distinguishing the six per cents, three per cents, and deferred stock, and in each kind of stock, stating, separately, the amount created by the assumption of the State Debts.

2d. The Registered Debt.

3d. The Debt subscribable to the Loan of the United States, but which, not being funded or registered at the Treasury, is not entitled to a dividend.

4th. The balances due to creditor States and already funded, (if there be any such,) being the excess of the sum respectively by law assumed, for such States, above the sums actually subscribed in the Debts of the said States.

[SENATE.]

Proceedings.

[JANUARY, 1794.]

5th. The Domestic Loans for cash, contracted since the commencement of the present Government, stating the respective times when borrowed, and when becoming due, together with the rate of interest.

6th. All other kinds of Domestic Debts not specially included under the five preceding heads, for the payment of which no appropriations have been made.

Second. A statement of the Domestic Debt redeemed since the commencement of the present Government to the first day of January, 1794, distinguishing the different species of Debt, and specifying the mode of redemption, and when redeemed for money, the amount of moneys expended in purchasing the same.

Third. A general statement of the Foreign Debt of the United States, as due on the first day of January, 1794, stating separately the French Debt, the other Debts contracted before the commencement of the present Government, and the Loans contracted since that time; and specifying, in each Debt for Loan, the original amount, the time from which the interest commenced, the payments already made, with the dates of the same, and the places where paid, the amount yet due, and the respective times when the same shall become due.

Fourth. A specific account of the application of the moneys obtained upon Foreign Loans contracted since the commencement of the present Government, to the first day of January, 1794, stating the amount of the moneys drawn over to America, and of those applied in Europe, together with the dates of such applications or drafts.

Fifth. A summary statement of the actual receipts and expenditures, from the commencement of the present Government to the last day of December, 1790, including all moneys received on account of the United States, such parts of the Foreign Loans as have not been drawn over to America only excepted; distinguishing the moneys received under each branch of the revenue, and the moneys expended under each appropriation, and stating the balances of each branch of the revenue remaining unexpended on the 31st day of December, 1790; specifying, separately, such balances as were on that day in the Treasury, and such as were uncollected, or in hands of any banks, officers, or other persons.

Sixth. Similar and separate statements for the years 1791, 1792, and 1793, respectively, specifying separately in each statement under each branch of the revenue, the moneys received on account of the revenue of that year, and those received on account of the revenue of each preceding year; and stating, so far as the same is now practicable, the amount of all moneys, bonds, or securities, on hand on the first day of January, 1794, with the times of payment of such bonds or securities.

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration. A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House of Representatives have passed the bill sent from the Senate for concurrence, entitled "An act making an alteration in the Flag of the United States."

THURSDAY, January 9.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of ALBERT GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States.

On motion,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow.

A motion was made, that the following amendment be recommended to the Legislatures of the respective States as part of the Constitution of the United States, two-thirds of both Houses agreeing thereto:

"The powers of the Government of the United States shall not extend to curtail or abridge the limits of the United States, as defined in the Treaty of Peace between Great Britain and the said States, dated at Paris, the third day of September, 1783, nor shall the State-rights of pre-emption to Indian hunting grounds, within the respective limits, after a fair treaty and sale, be questioned."

Ordered, That this motion lie on the table.

FRIDAY, January 10.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of ALBERT GALLATIN a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, stating that ALBERT GALLATIN, at the time he was elected a Senator of the United States, had not been nine years a citizen of the said United States, as is required by the Constitution, report:

"That the committee have conferred with Mr. Michael Schmyser, agent for the petitioners, and with Mr. GALLATIN; that Mr. Schmyser has declared that the petitioners are ready to adduce proofs in support of the petition at such time as the Senate may think proper to appoint; that Mr. GALLATIN states no objection to the trial's commencing at an early day. The committee therefore recommend that the Senate agree to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That — be assigned for hearing the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting Mr. GALLATIN's right to a seat in the Senate, and that Messrs. GALLATIN and Schmyser be furnished with a copy of this resolution."

On motion, it was agreed to postpone the report of the committee, and to take into consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a Committee of Elections, to consist of seven, be appointed to report rules for receiving petitions and conducting inquiries relative to the qualifications of a Senator; and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred to the same committee, to state the facts, and that they be authorized to send for persons and papers."

On which a motion was made and seconded to postpone this motion and to take up the following:

"That — be a committee to ascertain and state to the Senate the facts relative to the time when ALBERT GALLATIN became a citizen of the United States, and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded to postpone the preceding, and to take into consideration the following motion:

"Resolved, That a Committee of Elections be appointed, and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred to it, to report their opinion on the merits of the said petition."

[JANUARY, 1794.]

Proceedings.

[SENATE.]

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, January 13.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the appointment of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States.

On motion,

Ordered, That a Committee of Elections, to consist of seven, be appointed, and that the petition of Conrad Laub and others be referred, without prejudice as to any questions which may, upon the hearing, be raised by the sitting member, as to the sufficiency of the parties and the matter charged in the petition, to the same committee, to state the facts, and that they be authorized to send for persons and papers; also, that Messrs. BRADLEY, ELLSWORTH, MITCHELL, RUTHERFORD, BROWN, LIVERMORE, and TAYLOR, be this committee.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and it was agreed to consider at this time the following motion:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

And, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the motions of the 24th of December last, and the 9th of January instant, on the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, be postponed until to-morrow, and that the several motions on this subject be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions made the third instant, respecting certain statements from the Secretary of the Treasury; and, having agreed to sundry amendments thereon, it was adopted, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate a statement of the goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the several States from the first day of July, 1792, to the 30th day of June, 1793; specifying the quantities and value of each kind, and the several countries to which the same have respectively been exported.

Statements of the goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the several States, from the 1st day of July, 1791, to the 30th day of June, 1792, and from the 1st day of July, 1792, to the 30th day of June, 1793; specifying, for each period sepaately, the quantities and the prime cost and dutied values of each kind, and the several countries from which the same have respectively been imported.

Statements of the tonnage of foreign vessels, entered into the several States, from the 1st day of July, 1791, to the 30th day of June, 1792, and from the 1st day of July, 1792, to the 30th day of June, 1793; specifying, for each period separately, the several countries to which the said vessels respectively belong.

Statements of the tonnage of the United States' vessels, entered into the several States, from the 1st day of July, 1791, to the 30th day of June, 1792, and from the 1st day of July, 1792, to the 30th day of June, 1793; distinguishing, for each period separately, those employed in fisheries, in the coasting and in the foreign trade, and specifying the several countries from which the said vessels employed in the foreign trade came.

TUESDAY, January 14.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the Judicial power thereof.

On motion by Mr. GALLATIN, that the motion be amended to read as follows:

"The Judicial power of the United States, except in cases arising under treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

It passed in the negative.

On motion, that the motion be amended to read as follows:

"The Judicial power of the United States extends to all cases in law and equity in which one of the United States is a party; but no suit shall be prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of a foreign State, where the cause of action shall have arisen before the ratification of this amendment."

It passed in the negative.

And on the question to agree to the resolution as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradford, Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Cabot, Edwards, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, sen, Hawkins, Jackson, Izard, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mitchell, Monroe, Robinson, Strong, Taylor, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Gallatin and Rutherford.
Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following motion, viz:

"That the Constitution be amended by adding, at the end of the 9th section of the 1st article, the following clause:

"Nor shall any person, holding any office or stock in any institution in the nature of a bank, for issuing or discounting bills or notes payable to bearer or order, under the authority of the United States, be a member of either House whilst he holds such office or stock; but no power to grant any charter of incorporation, or any commercial or other monopoly, shall be hereby implied."

And, after debate, the further consideration of this motion was postponed until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 15.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, as being connected with the correspondence already in your possession, between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, the copy of a Letter from that Minister of the 25th of December, 1792, and a copy of the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina.

UNITED STATES, January 15, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, inhibiting the holders of any office or stock in the Bank of the United States from a seat in either House of Congress.

On motion to amend the motion, to be read as follows:

"Nor shall any person holding any office in any institution in the nature of a bank, under the authority of the United States, be a member of either House whilst he holds such office; but no power to grant any charter of incorporation, or any commercial or other monopoly, shall be hereby implied."

And, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 16.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, to amend the motion under consideration the 14th instant, for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, inhibiting the holders of any office or stock in the Bank of the United States from a seat in either House of Congress.

1st. Be it therefore enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, and by the authority of the same, That the 11th and 16th articles of the 7th section, and the 9th section, of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

2d. Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to dispose of, by sale, in such manner as he shall deem most conducive to the public interest, and as soon as may be after the passing of this act, all the interest or stock which the public were possessed of, or entitled to, in the said Bank, by virtue of their subscription to the same, in conformity to the 11th section of said act, the proceeds of which sales shall be disposed of as hereafter directed. And whereas it is desirable that the Debt due by the United States to the said Bank, by virtue of the subscription aforesaid, should be discharged at as early a period as may be, as well that the parties interested in the institution may become possessed of the funds, by which it is designed to be constituted, as the public completely exonerated from all claims or demands on that account.

3d. Be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be adjusted, if practicable, with the Directors of said Bank, upon such terms as shall be deemed just and reasonable, the balance which may be due by the United States to said Bank by virtue of said subscription, and the amount to be paid off, at such time or times as shall be agreed on, out of the proceeds of the sales of said stock: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to imply any obligation on the said Directors to accept of any adjustment, or payments, other than contained in, and specified by, the act aforesaid.

4th. And be it further enacted, That, if any surplus or balance shall remain from the sales aforesaid, after such adjustment with, or payment to, the Directors aforesaid, such balance shall be, and is hereby, applied to.

It passed in the negative, yeas 12, nays 13—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gallatin, Hawkins, Jackson, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Izard, King, Langdon, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Strong, and Vining.

On motion, by Mr. MARTIN, that the Senate adopt the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, in all representative Governments, the Representatives are responsible for their conduct to their constituents, who are entitled to such information that a discrimination and just estimate be made thereof.

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, being the Representatives of the sovereignties of the individual States, whose basis is the people, owe equal responsibility to the Powers by which they are appointed, as if that body were derived immediately from the people, and that all questions and debates arising thereupon in their Legislative and Judiciary capacity ought to be public.

"Resolved, That the mode adopted by the Senate of publishing their Journals, and extracts from them, in newspapers, is not adequate to the purpose of circulating satisfactory information. While the principles and designs of the individual members are withheld from public view, responsibility is destroyed, which, on the publicity of their deliberations, would be restored; the constitutional powers of the Senate become more important, in being more influential over the other branch of the Legislature; abuse of power, mal-administration of office, more easily detected and corrected; jealousy, arising in the public mind from secret Legislation, prevented, and greater confidences placed by our fellow-citizens in the National Government, by which their lives, liberties, and properties, are to be secured and protected.

"Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule, that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity, except on such occasions as in their judgment may require secrecy; and that this rule commence on — day of —."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration, and that, in the mean time, the proposed resolutions be printed for the use of the Senate.

FRIDAY, January 17.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and, after debate, on motion, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the motion made yesterday, that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open under certain restrictions; and, on motion, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion, that the Senate adopt the following order:

"That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before the Senate the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic, and between said Minister and the office of Secretary of State."

Ordered, That this motion lie until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 8th of January, instant, that the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate certain statements of the Public Debt; and, on motion, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

MONDAY, January 20.

The petition of Thomas Person and others, a committee on behalf of themselves and the other purchasers of lands in the ceded Territory South of the Ohio, referring to a petition presented to the Legislature of the State of North Carolina, praying for redress of certain matters therein contained, was presented and read.

Ordered, That this petition lie on the table. On motion, it was agreed that the motion made on the 17th instant, that the Secretary for the Department of State be directed to lay before the Senate the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic, should be further postponed.

The consideration of the motion made on the 8th instant, that the Secretary for the Department of the Treasury be requested to lay before the Senate certain statements of the Public Debt, was resumed; and being amended, was adopted, as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury do lay before this House the following statements, to wit:

First. A statement of the Domestic Debt of the United States as due on the 1st day of January, 1794, specifying, under distinct heads—

1st. The Funded Debt, distinguishing the six per cents, three per cents, and Deferred Stock, and in each kind of stock stating, separately, the amount created by the assumption of the State Debts.

2d. The Registered Debt.

3d. The Debt subscribable to the Loan of the United States, but which, not being funded on registered at the Treasury, is not entitled to a dividend.

4th. The balances due to creditor States and already funded, if there be any such, being the excess of the sums respectively by law assumed for such States, above the sums actually subscribed in the Debts of the said States.

5th. The Domestic Loans for cash contracted since the commencement of the present Government, stating the respective times when borrowed and when becoming due, together with the rate of interest.

6th. All other kinds of Domestic Debts not specially included under the five preceding heads, for the payment of which, no appropriations have been made.

Second. A statement of the Domestic Debt redeemed since the commencement of the present Government, to the first day of January, 1794; distinguishing the different species of Debt, and specifying the mode of redemption, and when redeemed for money, the amount of moneys expended in purchasing the same.

Third. A general statement of the Foreign Debt of the United States as due on the 1st day of January, 1794; stating, separately, the French Debt, the other Debts contracted before the commencement of the present Government, and the Loans contracted since that amount; and specifying, in each Debt or Loan, the original time from which the interest commenced, the payments already made, with the dates of the same, and the places where paid, the amount yet due, and the respective times when the same shall become due.

Fourth. A specific account of the application of the moneys obtained upon Foreign Loans, contracted since the commencement of the present Government, to the 1st day of January, 1794; stating the amount of the moneys drawn over to America, and those applied in Europe, together with the dates of such applications or drafts.

Fifth. A summary statement of the actual receipts and expenditures from the commencement of the present Government to the last day of December, 1790, including all moneys received on account of the United States, such parts of the Foreign Loans as have not been drawn over to America only excepted; distinguishing the moneys received under each branch of the revenue, and the moneys expended under each appropriation, and stating the balances of each branch of the revenue remaining unexpended on the 31st day of December, 1790; specifying separately such balances as were on that day in the Treasury, and such as were uncollected or in the hands of any banks, officers, or other persons.

Sixth. Similar and separate statements for the years 1791, and 1792, respectively, and so far as the same is now practicable, for the year 1793; specifying, separately, ately, in each statement, under each branch of the revenue, the moneys received on account of the revenue of that year and those received on account of the revenue of each preceding year, and stating, so far as the same is now practicable, the amount of all moneys, bonds or securities, on hand, on the first day of January, 1794, with the times of payment of such bonds or securities.

TUESDAY, January 21.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Having already laid before you a Letter of the 16th of August, 1793, from the Secretary of State to our Minister at Paris, stating the conduct and urging the recal of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of France, I now communicate to you, that his conduct has been unequivocally disapproved; and that the strongest assurances have been given, that his recal should be expedited without delay.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 20, 1794.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie on file.

The memorial of the people called Quakers, from the yearly meeting held at Rhode Island for New England, in the year 1793, was presented and read, praying Congress to exercise the authority vested in them by the Constitution for the suppression of the slave trade.

Ordered, That this petition lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

It is with satisfaction I announce to you that the alterations which have been made by law in the original plan for raising a duty on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, co-operating with better information, have had a considerable influence in obviating the difficulties, which have embarrassed that branch of the public revenue. But the obstacles which have been experienced, though lessened, are not yet entirely surmounted; and it would seem that some further Legislative provisions may usefully be superadded; which leads me to recal the attention of Congress to the subject. Among the matters which may demand regulation, is the effect, in point of organization, produced by the separation of Kentucky from the State of Virginia; and the situation, with regard to the law, of the Territories Northwest and Southwest of the Ohio.

The laws respecting light house establishments, require, as a condition of their permanent maintenance, at the expense of the United States, a complete cession of soil and jurisdiction. The cessions of different States having been qualified within the ceded jurisdiction, are serving legal process within the ceded jurisdiction, are understood to be inconclusive, as annexing a qualification not consonant, with the terms of the law. I present this circumstance to the view of Congress, that they may judge whether any alteration ought to be made.

As it appears to be conformable with the intention of the Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, although it is not expressly directed, that the laws of that Territory should be laid before Congress, I now transmit to you a copy of such as have been passed, from July to December, 1792, inclusive; being the last which have been received by the Secretary of State.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 21, 1794.

The Message and copy of laws referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, LIVERMORE, and BROWN, be a committee to take into consideration the laws passed in the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, from July to December, 1792, inclusive, and report thereon to the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, January 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate sundry Communications from the Secretary for the Department of War, respecting a Treaty of Peace lately concluded by James Seagrove, agent for Indian affairs on behalf of the United States, with the chiefs and warriors on behalf of the Creek Indians.

The papers communicated were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the motion made the 16th instant, that the doors of the Senate Chamber "should remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity."

On motion, it was agreed to postpone the consideration of this subject to this day fortnight.

THURSDAY, January 23.

On motion, by Mr. CABOT, "that a committee be appointed to consider of the expediency of allowing the drawback on the re-exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise, from ports other than those into which they were first imported, and to report a bill for that purpose, if they shall think it proper."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I forward to you extracts from the last advices from our Minister in London, as being connected with communications already made.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 22, 1794.

The Message and extracts were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

The motion made on the 17th instant, that the Secretary of State be directed to lay before the Senate the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic, and between said Minister and the office of the Secretary of State, was resumed; and

A motion was made to amend the motion, to be read as follows:

"That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic, and between said Minister and the office of the Secretary of State."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 24.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 17th instant, together with the amendment proposed on the 23d, respecting the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic.

And on motion, to agree to the resolution, amended as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate the correspondences which have been had between the Minister of the United States at the Republic of France and said Republic, and between said Minister and the office of the Secretary of State."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gallatin, Hawkins, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Izard, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Strong, and Vining.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a translation of the French Act of Navigation.

WEDNESDAY, January 29.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee appointed to consider the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States," reported amendments, which were agreed to.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed.

THURSDAY, January 30.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Communications have been made to Congress during the present session, with the intention of affording a full view of the posture of affairs on the Southwestern frontier. By the information which has lately been laid before Congress, it appeared that the difficulties with the Creeks had been amicably and happily terminated. But it will be perceived with regret, by the papers herewith transmitted, that the tranquility has unfortunately been of short duration, owing to the murder of several friendly Indians, by some lawless white men.

The condition of things in that quarter, requires the serious and immediate consideration of Congress, and the adoption of such wise and vigorous laws as will be competent to the preservation of the national character, and of the peace made under the authority of the United States with the several Indian tribes. Experience demonstrates that the existing legal provisions are entirely inadequate to those great objects.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 30, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration. The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States;" and, after debate, the further consideration thereof was postponed.

concurrence, entitled "An act providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found in want of support."

On motion that it be recommitted, for the purpose of further inquiry, it passed in the negative. And, after agreeing to an amendment, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the last clause of the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 30th of December.

On motion to recommit the report, and that the committee be instructed to bring in a bill for the purposes therein mentioned, it passed in the negative. It was then agreed that the report of the committee be adopted.

Whereupon, it was

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the payment notified by the President of the United States, in his Message of the 30th of December last, to have been made, be approved; and that the President be authorized to make further advances on the same account, as he may judge expedient, not exceeding in the whole the amount which might be claimed of the United States, on the principles stated in the Message.

Ordered, That the Secretary desire the concurrence of the House of Representatives in this resolution.

FRIDAY, February 7.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you an Act and three Ordinances passed by the Government of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, on the 13th and 21st of March, and the 7th of May, 1793; and also certain Letters from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, to the Secretary of State, enclosing despatches from the General and Extraordinary Commission of Gaudaloupe.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 7, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That the Act and three Ordinances, mentioned in the Message, be referred to the committee appointed the 21st of January last, to whom were referred the laws passed in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Ordered, That the other papers referred to in the Message lie for consideration.

The Senate proceeded to the third reading of the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found in want of support." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

Resolved, That the resolution passed yesterday, on the report of the committee appointed to consider the last paragraph of the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 30th of December last, be reconsidered.

Ordered, That Messrs. BARR, ELLSWORTH, and KING, be a committee to take into consideration the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 30th of December, and that the committee be directed to report a bill to carry the same into execution.

The bill authorizing and directing the settlement of the accounts of Major General LAFAYETTE was read the second time, and, after debate, it was ordered to lie for consideration and inquiry.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill in addition to "The act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;" and, after debate, the bill was ordered to be committed.

Mr. CABOT, from the committee appointed the third instant, reported a bill in alteration of the act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States, which was read the first time and ordered to a second reading.

MONDAY, February 17.

The petition of Michael Schmyser, agent for Conrad Laub and others, petitioners against the election of ALBERT GALLATIN, to be a Senator of the United States, was presented and read, praying to be heard by counsel.

Ordered, That the prayer of the petition be granted.

The consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States, was resumed, and, after progress, it was ordered that the consideration thereof be postponed until Wednesday next.

The bill in alteration of "The act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States," was read the second time and ordered to a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 18.

Mr. STRONG, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, reported amendments.

Ordered, That the bill be printed as the committee have reported it amended.

The bill in alteration of the act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States was read the third time and passed.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, together with fourteen statements of tonnage, for a year ending the 30th of September, 1792, according to the entries of vessels in the United States during that period; which were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, February 19.

JAMES GUNN, from Georgia took his seat in the Senate.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, respecting the election of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be further postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a Letter which I have received from the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, at their desire, the representation, mentioned in the said Letter, pointing out certain defects in the Judiciary system. G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 19, 1794.

The Message and representation therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. ELLSWORTH, STRONG, TAYLOR, LIVERMORE, and POTTS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Conformably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 16th of January last, that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity.

On motion, by Mr. MARTIN, that the question be now taken on the propositions generally, A motion was made for the previous question, to wit: Shall the question be now put on the following preliminary resolutions?

Resolved, That, in all Representative Governments, the Representatives are responsible for their conduct to their constituents, who are entitled to such information, that a discrimination and just estimate be made thereof.

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, being the Representatives of the Sovereignities of the individual States, whose basis is the people, owe equal responsibility to the powers by which they are appointed, as if that body were derived immediately from the people, and that all questions and debates arising thereupon in their Legislative and Judiciary capacity, ought to be public.

Resolved, That the mode adopted by the Senate of publishing their journals, and extracts from them, in newspapers, is not adequate to the purpose of circulating satisfactory information. While the principles and designs of the individual members are withheld from public view, responsibility is destroyed, which, on the publicity of their deliberations, would be restored; the Constitutional powers of the Senate become more important, in being more influential over the other branch of the Legislature; abuse of power, mal-administration, of office, more easily detected and corrected; jealousies, rising in the public mind from secret legislation, prevented; and greater confidence placed by our fellow-citizens in the National Government, by which their lives, liberties, and properties, are to be secured and protected.

It passed in the negative.

On motion to postpone the main question to the next session of Congress, to wit:

"Resolved, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity, except on such occasions as in their judgment may require secrecy; and that this rule commence on — day of —."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradford, Bradley, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Izard, Langdon, Livermore, Mitchell, Morris, Rutherford, Strong, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Gallatin, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Martin, Monroe, Potts, and Taylor.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, authorizing and directing the settlement of the accounts of Major General LAFAYETTE; and having amended the same, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

On motion to reconsider the following motion, to wit:

"Resolved, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open while the Senate shall be sitting in a Legislative and Judiciary capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule commence on — day of —."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Foster, Gallatin, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Monroe, Potts, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Frelinghuysen, Izard, Mitchell, Morris, Rutherford, Strong, and Vining.

A motion was made to amend the motion last reconsidered, as follows:

"Resolved, That, after the end of the present session of Congress, and, so soon as suitable galleries shall be provided for the Senate Chamber, the said galleries shall be permitted to be opened every morning, so long as the Senate shall be engaged in their Legislative capacity, unless in such cases as may in the opinion of the Senate require secrecy, after which the said galleries shall be closed."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 20.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday, to amend the motion then reconsidered, respecting the opening the doors of the Senate Chamber whilst sitting in a Legislative capacity.

On motion to commit the motion for amendment, it passed in the negative.

On motion, that the amendment be agreed to, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Ellsworth, Foster, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Monroe, Potts, Taylor, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Frelinghuysen, Gallatin, Izard, Mitchell, Morris, Rutherford, and Strong.

On motion to adopt the resolution, amended as follows:

"Resolved, That, after the end of the present session of Congress, and so soon as suitable galleries shall be provided for the Senate Chamber, the said galleries shall be permitted to be opened every morning, so long as the Senate shall be engaged in their Legislative capacity, unless in such cases as may, in the opinion of the Senate, require secrecy, after which the said galleries shall be closed."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Edwards, Ellsworth, Foster, Gallatin, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Monroe, Potes, Taylor, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Frelinghuysen, Izard, Mitchell, Morris, Rutherford, and Strong.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the remission of the duties arising on the tonnage of sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Resolved, That, on a motion made and seconded to shut the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a member, require secrecy, the President shall direct the gallery to be cleared; and that, during the discussion of such motion, the doors shall remain shut.

Ordered, That the second reading of the bill in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, as reported to be amended by the committee, be the order of the day for Tuesday next.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub, and others, respecting the election of Mr. Gallatin to be a Senator of the United States.

The Report of the Committee states the evidence, and concludes with an opinion, that to controvert the allegations set forth in the petition against Mr. G., it lays with him to prove his citizenship.

Accordingly, Mr. G. presented a written statement of facts, which the PRESIDENT of the Senate read. It contained a narrative of several transactions from the time of Mr. G.'s arrival in the Province of Maine, or Massachusetts, about thirteen years ago. Of his having contributed by money and his own services as a volunteer, in the cause of the Revolution. Of his having taken oaths of allegiance and purchased lands in that State, and also in the State of Virginia. In the last parts of the last mentioned State, he had formed an interesting settlement, and had been extremely useful in bringing settlers from Europe. The dates of those transactions and times of his arrival in Pennsylvania, and of being sent to the State Convention, 1783, and before the Confederation. He quoted the laws previous thereto respecting aliens, and also the British statutes, and he maintained that they were all done away by the Revolution. He conceived himself a citizen in common with the other citizens of the United States, from the time of his first qualifying after his arrival and attachment to the country. He concluded by saying, he would reserve the remainder of his defence until after he should hear the counsel on behalf of the petitioners.

Mr. Lewis commenced his speech by observing, that he appeared there on behalf of Conrad Laub, and other respectable men, who complained of the unconstitutionality of admitting Mr. GALLATIN to a seat in the Senate. He was glad to find, by the gentleman's expressions, that the ground of debate had been narrowed into so small a compass, and he would therefore take him up from the argument where he had left off speaking, that of his being a citizen in common of the United States, from the time of his qualifying in Massachusetts or Virginia. But in Virginia two oaths are required, and they must be taken in a Court, not before a Magistrate, to entitle a man to citizenship. He must also be possessed of a certain quantity of property and be a resident for two years. It appears Mr. G. did not remain in Virginia more than two months. [Here Mr. Lewis read the law of Virginia of the 20th October, 1783.] On this law Mr. L. argued that Mr. G. had not gone through the necessary qualifications to entitle him to citizenship there; and he observed, that he admired the gentleman's candor in not insisting on it here. In this State he had certainly not qualified himself agreeably to the law. Under these circumstances, Mr. L. for his part could never admit of the gentleman's right to citizenship so far back as to entitle him to the suffrage of a vote for a seat in the Senate, &c.

The mischievous consequences of permitting such innovations he represented in strong terms; and he called to the recollection of the Senate the conduct of ancient and modern Governments on this question. One of the ancient Republics made it death for an alien to intermeddle in their politics. The sentiments of antiquity, and those of men in modern days, proved the justice of these conclusions.

With regard to the arguments of the gentleman respecting his being entitled to be a citizen of the Union, or of any individual State of it, because he had qualified himself to be a citizen of one of them, Mr. L. said, was a mere bubble, for surely the gentleman was not one of the mass of citizens at the accomplishment of Independence.

The doctrine of the old law, which the gentleman says was done away by the Revolution, in respect to aliens, may have been so with regard to the British king; it was still, however, virtually in force against the gentleman. But supposing it to be done away, how do the Constitutions of the different States stand on this head? Is it not implied by all of them, that certain oaths, residence, and property, make the requisites to form citizenship? In Massachusetts, a foreigner is not a citizen without he complies with those terms. [Here he quoted p. 70 of the small volume of the Laws of Massachusetts. He also cited the act in favor of John Jarvis and others; also, p. 104 of the same book, and p. 191 and 192.] From these he maintained, that no such wild idea was ever contemplated by either the law of Massachusetts or Virginia, as to admit foreigners or persons from other States to citizenship, immediately on their entrance within their limits.

The situation of the sitting member, with respect to the Constitution and laws of Pennsylvania, he had little doubt was similar to what he had mentioned in regard to the other States, although he would not assert it as a fact. [He read the 42d section, and also in p. 43 of the Law of Pennsylvania, 13th of March, 1789, a proviso which contains some precautions requiring records to be kept by the Master of the Rolls of the persons admitted to citizenship.] The same principle pervades all the States as well as it does the Constitution of the United States. The absurdity of applying it in any other sense, was severely pictured by Mr. L., and to admit the idea advanced by the sitting member, was as inadmissible as it was novel. In support of what he wished to impress on the minds of the Senate, Mr. L. quoted the 1st vol. of the Journals of Congress in 1774 and 1775, p. 28 and 29. He then resorted to Blackstone, vol. 1. p. 63, 64, and 69; also 73 and 79.

It was not his intention to quote the Parliamentary Laws of England in support of any thing, but such parts of their Common Law as could be got over. That Common Law of England which was imported by our ancestors, and handed down to them by the People, not the Parliament. The People had made the Common Law, from time to time. The Saxons, Normans, &c., were all concerned in making and improving it, until it had finally reached that degree of perfection in which it was given to us by our ancestors, and it was founded in wisdom and justice.

Mr. L. next quoted, first Blackstone, 402, which was one of the British laws that had never been admitted in this country, and which, he hoped, never would, viz: that wherein the distinction is drawn between the Commoner and the Peer, an oath being required of the Commoner, upon all occasions, and no more than "upon my honor," from a Peer, except in giving evidence in civil or criminal trials.

Mr. L. concluded by saying that the difficulties which stood between Mr. GALLATIN and his seat, were insurmountable and could not be removed without showing a law of Massachusetts, Virginia, &c., repealing those laws in regard to the qualification of citizens, which he had mentioned, but which repeal he was certain did not exist. He therefore stated, that to insist upon the gentleman's right to a seat, was both novel and absurd. These were his opinions, which he had given in a perfectly extempore way, not having been allowed time, nor expecting to meet the subject on the new ground which it had this day taken in the Senate.

Mr. GALLATIN said, he would pledge himself to the Senate, to prove that the grounds of his arguments and his construction of the Confederation and laws of the States, was rather novel nor absurd, except in Mr. L.'s construction of them, but had been admitted in many instances. However, as the Common Law of England was now introduced by Mr. L., which was new ground to him, and as the hour of adjournment was nearly approaching, he would beg leave to make his reply to-morrow.

On motion, the further consideration of this subject was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 21.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the remission of the duties arising on the tonnage of sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States;" was read the second time and referred to Messrs. CABOT, BURK, and LANGDOX, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary for the Department of War, stating certain defects in the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;" which was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

CONTENDED ELECTION.

Agreeably to the order of the day the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub, and others, respecting the election of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States.

Mr. GALLATIN commenced his defence by laying down the principles on which he intended to argue. His was a very serious situation, for a person to be placed in, who had been so long in America, and who had mingled with the inhabitants in the common cause, that he should afterwards be called before so solemn a tribunal, with an intention to wrest from him his right of citizenship. He confessed, that on this occasion his feelings were deeply interested, particularly as the manner of the counsel for the prosecutors was so personal, and went not only to deny him a seat in the Senate of the United States, but even to contest his citizenship, and denounce him as being yet an alien.

This was a matter of consequence to many thousands as well as himself, who have long considered themselves in possession of all the privilege of denizens, and yet may be deprived of their rights, if the doctrines of the counsel for the prosecutors should obtain any sanction from the body who were now to judge of its merits.

Mr. G. entered into a series of observations on the various points of law, &c., which had been adduced by Mr. Lewis, and he particularly remarked, that the Common Law of England was entirely inapplicable to the subject under consideration. He read the laws of Virginia respecting naturalization, &c., from which he insisted that he had long since become a citizen of the United States. He also quoted 1st Blackstone, p. 374, and Viner's Abridgment, vol. ii. p. 266, respecting the different acceptations of denizen and citizen, and he went back so far as the British statutes in 1740, to show the intention of the old Government was to naturalize all persons who would go and reside in the Colonies. He next mentioned the act of Pennsylvania, of 31st of August, 1778, and commented on the principles generally entertained by most writers on the subjects of allegiance and citizenship. Blackstone, 266, &c.

An alien is a man born out of the allegiance of the King. But allegiance in England is not an allegiance to the country or to society, as it is understood in this country.

In order to explain the principle of reciprocity, he observed, that when the two crowns of England and Scotland were united under James, the inhabitants of Scotland became naturalized in England, as if they had been natural-born subjects of that country. The allegiance in Britain was personal to the King, and it has there this remarkable quality, that by the British laws allegiance can never be shaken off.

This country, before the Revolution, owed allegiance to the King, but that was destroyed by the Declaration of Independence, and then the inhabitants of the States became mutually citizens of every State reciprocally; and they continued so until such time as the States made laws of their own afterwards respecting naturalization.

As soon as separate Governments existed, allegiance was due to each, and here the allegiance was a reality, it was to the Government and to society, whereas in Britain it is merely fictitious, being only to one man.

Every man who took an active part in the American Revolution, was a citizen according to the great laws of reason and of nature, and when afterwards positive laws were made, they were retrospective in regard to persons under this predicament, nor did those posterior laws invalidate the rights which they enjoy under the Confederation.

Mr. G. here mentioned his having been an inhabitant of Massachusetts, before October, 1780, and he also observed, that the law passed in that State was decisive against the Common Law of England.

In quoting the laws of Massachusetts, which were passed in 1785, and afterwards, for naturalizing John Gardner, and James Martin, he remarked that they clearly implied that even a natural born subject, who had not acted in the Revolution, and an absentee, was not entitled to citizenship. He likewise took notice of the case of Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, of South Carolina, against whose election as a Representative in Congress, a petition was presented by Doctor Ramsey, although the decision of South Carolina on that subject was exactly the reverse of Massachusetts.

In speaking of the difficulties that occurred in explaining the terms citizen and alien, he ran over a number of cases, and asked whether if a person had arrived in the United States during the war, from Nova-Scotia, or elsewhere, and had taken an active part against the enemy, would he not be better entitled to the right of a citizen, than even those who afterwards subscribed to the acts? The counsel for the prosecutors had admitted that a person who had been one of the mass of the people, on the Declaration of Independence, was a citizen. On the same principle, until a law passes to disprove that a man who was active in the Revolution previous to the Treaty of Peace, was a citizen, he must be one ipso facto.

Mr. G. next read a quotation from the 1st. vol. of Woodson, p. 382, an English writer, who acknowledged that all persons were aliens at the recognition of Independence, and that is a more liberal construction than the counsel for the petitioners would admit of, for by his construction, our sailors, &c., ought to be naturalized, lest they be alarmed by the British.

The new Constitution of the United States requires certain qualifications for members of Congress, &c., but it does not deprive persons of their rights who were actually citizens before this Constitution was ratified that made the States the United States. They were United by consent before, and consequently he was one of the people before the United States existed.

He went on to read from the Constitution of Massachusetts, and several other States, sundry clauses in support of his reasoning, and recapitulated the several heads of Mr. L.'s arguments, to each of which he replied.

Mr. G. said, that Mr. Lewis was unfortunate in producing the law of Pennsylvania, for, by proving too much, he had proved nothing, for the 42d sec. of the Constitution is retrospective, and by acknowledging the Articles of Confederation to be the supreme law of the land, persons who were reciprocally citizens before, are still left in full possession of the right.

So far from any dangerous consequences arising on my construction of citizenship, said he, I think it must be evident, that there is more danger and absurdity in the counsel's own constructions. For, in remarking on the policy of nations, we find even slaves have been enfranchised by the great Republics in times of common danger. The policy of America should be to make citizenship as easy as possible, for the purpose of encouraging population; even during the British dominion that was a principle laid down, and afterwards it was attempted to be varied; it is made one of the principal subjects of complaint in the Declaration of Independence, where it is expressly said, that the King endeavored to prevent the population of these States, by having laws made to obstruct the naturalization of foreigners.

If there was any dangerous consequences to be apprehended from the former regulations on this subject, they are all remedied by the new Constitution.

Therefore, no ill consequence or absurdity can follow. The author of the Federalist supports this principle in vol. ii. p. 54, for he says, that it is a construction scarcely avoidable, that citizens of each of the States are mutually so in all of them.

The first words in the Constitution, "We, the People," furnished another argument in support of Mr. G.'s principles, which he turned to great advantage, still drawing an inference to show that Mr. L.'s construction of the subject was most liable to difficulties and to mischievous consequences.

He concluded by observing, that if there was any disfranchising clauses in the Constitution of the United States, tending to deprive citizens of antecedent rights, all such clauses must be construed favorably, and were evidently on his side. With regard to a sentence that had been added, by the advice of counsel, to the affidavit of Pelatiah Webster, he made some remarks which tended to establish his own personal character, which he trusted would be found, when traced back to a seat in the Senate would also stand upon an equally just foundation.

Mr. Lewis denied ever having seen the affidavit of Mr. Webster, until it was shown him at the time the examination before the Committee was going forward.

Mr. GALLATIN rectriminated, that the clause of which he took notice, was not in the affidavit when Mr. Webster brought it to the Committee, and that he had permitted it to be added with great reluctance. It was only the recital of a few words which passed between Mr. G. and Mr. W. in jest, some years since, wherein Mr. G. had ironically said his name was Sidney, probably alluding to some essays that had appeared in the newspapers under that signature, which have been generally attributed to the pen of another gentleman in this State.

Mr. JACKSON, in order to bring the merits of the subject directly before the Senate, said he would move a resolution, that would have that effect; but upon Mr. Lewis's observing, that he had not yet closed his arguments, and at the instance of Mr. BUTLER, from South Carolina, who said he would second Mr. JACKSON's motion hereafter, it was withdrawn for the present.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

SATURDAY, February 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a Report from the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, on the expediency of erecting a light house on Cape Hatteras, in the State of North Carolina, together with sundry papers therein referred to; which were read.

Ordered, That this report, and the papers therein referred to, be committed to Messrs. MARTIN, LANGDOX, and KING, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

CONTENDED ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub, and others, respecting the election of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and read:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I have caused the correspondence, which is the subject of your resolution of the 24th day of January last, to be laid before me. After an examination of it, I directed copies and translations to be made; except in those particulars which, in my judgment, for public considerations, ought not to be communicated.

These copies and translations are now transmitted to the Senate; but the nature of them manifest the propriety of their being received as confidential.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 26, 1794.

Ordered, That the Message and papers therein referred to lie for consideration.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives, for concurrence, entitled "An act making Appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four," was read the second time, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed.

THURSDAY, February 27.

Ordered, That the bill from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making Appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four," be referred to Messrs. extensive field of reasoning, and quoted a great number of authorities, in support of the principles on which he had set out last Thursday, and to prove that in the true sense of the Constitution of the United States, as well as of that of the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. GALLATIN was not duly qualified for the office of a Senator, and therefore, he trusted that the honorable Senate, upon mature reflection, would vacate his seat.

Mr. GALLATIN closed his defence in a short speech, wherein he quoted Fattel, p. 167, and explained the 42d section of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, the liberal construction of which, he said, was in his favor, and the construction contended for by the counsel, absurd. He finished by reading a passage from Lord Bacon's works, to show that where there is any doubt in the laws, it should operate in favor of the defendant, and he accordingly made no doubt but that the Senate would validate his election.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday next.

A motion was made as follows:

Resolved, That ALBERT GALLATIN, returned to this House as a member for the State of Pennsylvania, is duly qualified for, and elected to, a seat in the Senate of the United States:

Ordered, That the consideration of this motion be postponed until Monday next, and that a number of copies of the fourth article of the First Constitution of the United States be printed for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 24.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made the twenty-second instant, on the report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub, and others, respecting the election of Mr. GALLATIN to be a Senator of the United States; and, after progress,

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making Appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

The extracts which I now lay before you, from a Letter of our Minister at London, are supplementary to some of my past communications, and it will appear to be of a confidential nature.

I also transmit to you copies of a Letter from the Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, and of the answer thereto, upon the subject of the Treaty between the United States and Great Britain; together with the copy of a Letter from Messrs. Carmichael and Short, relative to our affairs with Spain, which Letter is connected with a former confidential Message.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 24, 1794.

ALBERT GALLATIN to be void, be transmitted by the President of the Senate to the Executive of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The report of the committee on the petition of Conrad Laub and others, above referred to, and made on the 10th instant, is as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Conrad Laub and others, against the election of the Honorable ALBERT GALLATIN as a Senator of the United States for the State of Pennsylvania, report:

"That they have had the same under consideration, and, having given due notice, as well the petitioners by their agent, Michael Schmyzer, as the said Mr. GALLATIN appeared before them, and, on the part of the petitioners, the following evidence was produced, to wit:

"Robert Morris, Esq., being duly sworn, deposed: That, during the war, two of his sons went to Geneva for their education, and at that place they became acquainted with some of the friends of Mr. Albert Gallatin, who had gone for America, and they being solicitous to hear of his safety, desired Mr. Morris's sons to write to their father, to make inquiry and give the information he should obtain. That, frequently afterwards, he received letters for Mr. Gallatin from Europe, which he always supposed to come from the friends of Mr. Gallatin, in Geneva. He supplied Mr. Gallatin with money for a bill upon London, and there supposed the funds to pay the same were remitted from Geneva.

Mr. Morris paid Mr. Gallatin about one thousand guineas, by order of Messrs. ——— & Co., bankers in Paris, believing always that they were reimbursed from Geneva. Mr. Morris does not recollect dates, not having for a long while seen any of the letters that passed on the subject; he does not know the place of Mr. Gallatin's nativity, but, from the general course of the circumstances which came under his observation, he always did suppose he was born in Geneva."

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

"Nathaniel Cabot Higginson, Esq., being duly sworn, deposed: That he does not know directly anything of Mr. Gallatin's being a foreigner or native; that he recollects knowing him by reputation and sight at Boston, in one of the years 1781, 1782, or 1783, and that he was generally reputed to be a foreigner. This deponent believes that Mr. Gallatin then taught the French language, and did not speak the English with facility; and further recollects that Mr. Gallatin was resident there or thereabouts a considerable time. This deponent further says, that he never had any conversation with Mr. Gallatin, but founds his belief, with respect to Mr. Gallatin's not speaking the English with facility, on the information received from others."

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

"Mr. John Breakbill, being duly sworn, testifies: That, last Winter, being a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to the election of Senator for the State of Pennsylvania, I heard Mr. Gallatin say his citizenship would not admit his being a Senator; what were his reasons for making the declaration I cannot say; I took it, he did not wish to be elected. This declaration by Mr. Gallatin was made at a meeting of a number of members of the Pennsylvania Legislature, held for the purpose of agreeing who should be set up as a candidate. The deponent further says, he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's assigning any other reason for his backwardness to serve as a Senator, than the want of citizenship."

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

"Henry Kammerer, Esq., being duly sworn, testifies:

That last Winter, being a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and previous to the election of Senator for the said State, at a meeting of a number of the members of the State Legislature, to agree upon a candidate to fill said office, I heard Mr. Gallatin say, when his name was proposed, "As for my name, it is out of the question: I have not been a citizen long enough to entitle me to serve in that station." That, at a second meeting for the same purpose, Mr. Gallatin was again proposed as a proper person for a candidate, and then the deponent understood (not from Mr. Gallatin, but from some of the members of Assembly then present,) that the doubt about his citizenship was then put to rest; and then it was almost unanimously agreed to put up Mr. Gallatin's name. That, on the morning succeeding Mr. Gallatin's election, the deponent heard it observed, that, notwithstanding Mr. Gallatin's election, he could not take his seat, in consequence of his declaration that he had not been long enough a citizen. That he, the same day, mentioned this to Mr. Gallatin, who said that he had made this declaration under a mistaken idea that it was necessary for him to have been nine years a citizen of Pennsylvania, but that, upon examining the Constitution, he had found that to have been nine years a citizen of the United States was sufficient, and that he had been above nine years a citizen of the United States, or words to that effect.

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 22, 1794."

"Pelatiah Webster, being duly qualified, testifies: That, eleven years ago last Summer, I let my house in Philadelphia to Mary Linn, who proposed to take lodgings; I reserved apartments for myself, and boarded with her. Soon after, Mr. Savery and Mr. Gallatin took lodgings of her, and continued a number of months there. Mr. Savery spoke no English; Mr. Gallatin spoke good English, and served as interpreter for him. They appeared to be well bred gentlemen, and their conduct was agreeable and conciliating; and they soon gained the esteem and respect of the family. I do not know that they ever declared their country, but we all supposed they were French, and of course, the people, customs, and country of France often made the topic of fireside chat. In one of these transient conversations, Mr. Gallatin took occasion to say that his knowledge of French affairs was not very perfect, for he was not a native of France, nor had ever resided long in that country, but was from Geneva. No one interesting circumstance made any further inquiry necessary, nor do I recollect that he made any more explication of the subject.

"N. B. Mr. Gallatin once said that his original name was not Gallatin, but I think he said it was Sidney, but this conversation was in drudgery, and not in earnest, as I conceived at the time of speaking from the manner and air of his speaking, &c."

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 28, 1794."

"Mr. John Smilie, member of the House of Representatives of the United States, being sworn, saith, that at a meeting of sundry members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, previous to Mr. Gallatin's election as a Senator of the United States, that gentleman was mentioned as a proper person to fill the said office; at which time Mr. Gallatin started some doubt respecting his being qualified, but in what words the deponent does not recollect.

That the deponent did not understand upon what the doubt was founded, though he thinks, from something said by Mr. Gallatin, that it related to Mr. Gallatin's citizenship, for, as the deponent conceived the conversation proceeded from that kind of modesty which gentlemen usually feel upon having their names proposed upon such occasions, he did not pay much attention to it; and that his reason for forming this opinion was, his having frequently observed gentlemen to make excuses in similar situations, and from his knowledge of Mr. Gallatin's modesty of disposition. When being asked, whether he ever heard Mr. Gallatin say that he had not been a citizen of the United States nine years previous to his election, the deponent replies, he never did. Upon being asked by Mr. Lewis, counsel for the petitioners, what he had ever heard Mr. Gallatin say touching his citizenship, the deponent replies, that a considerable time subsequent to Mr. Gallatin's election, Mr. Gallatin, in conversations with the deponent, expressed an opinion, that he was qualified with respect to citizenship. What else did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say with respect to his citizenship? The deponent answers, that he recollects having heard him say something with respect to the laws of Massachusetts not requiring an oath of allegiance, at the time of his giving his opinion as aforesaid. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say he was born in Europe? The deponent replies, that he does not recollect Mr. Gallatin's saying that he was born in Europe, but that he has heard Mr. Gallatin speak of himself as a Genevan, mention his family in Geneva, and in conversations with him bath always understood him to be of Geneva. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin mention the time of his coming into America? He replies, that he thinks Mr. Gallatin, about a year past, mentioned that he had been thirteen years in this country, and that he was nineteen years old when he came. Did you ever hear Mr. Gallatin say when or where he took the oath of allegiance? He replies, he heard Mr. Gallatin say that he took the oath of allegiance in Virginia, but, as to the time, the deponent cannot be precise, but he thinks, if he can recollect, that Mr. Gallatin did mention to him, though he cannot be certain; but it was not nine years before he was elected. That the deponent thinks Mr. Gallatin's doubts respecting his citizenship were founded on this ground, the witness referring in this part of his testimony to the meeting before mentioned, when these doubts were expressed; but he cannot specify the time of Mr. Gallatin's having mentioned to him the circumstance of his having taken the oath of allegiance.

"Sworn to, and subscribed, January 28, 1794."

"Mr. Thomas Stokely, being sworn, deposeseth and saith, that, some few days before a Senator was chosen for the State of Pennsylvania, a meeting was had to fix on a proper person to represent the State in that office; sundry persons were started as candidates, among whom was Mr. Gallatin, who, upon his being named, observed that there were many other persons more proper to fill that office; and also observed, that there might be doubts as to his citizenship, though the deponent, from the length of time, and not expecting to have been called upon, retains too slight an impression of what then passed, to be able to recollect the words with precision. That, at a subsequent meeting for the same purpose, Mr. Gallatin was finally agreed to be nominated, and the deponent heard no objection stated thereto, either by Mr. Gallatin (who was present) or any other person.

"Sworn to, and subscribed, February 1, 1794."

"The before-recited evidence being introduced and closed on the part of the petitioners, Mr. Gallatin was asked whether he had any testimony to produce on his part, to which he gave the following answer, in writing, to wit:

"The committee to whom the petition of Conrad

Laub, &c., was referred, having informed me that the petitioners had closed their evidence, and asked me whether I had any testimony to produce on my side. I answer, that it appears to me that there is not sufficient matter charged in the petition, and proved by the testimony, to vacate my seat; that, by the resolution appointing the committee, the petition is referred to them to state the facts, without prejudice as to any questions which may, upon the hearing, be raised by the sitting member, as to the sufficiency of the parties and the matter charged in the petition; that, upon the hearing, and in the present stage of the same, the question as to the sufficiency of matter, as above stated, is raised by me; that I conceive, from the evident construction of the resolution, I have a right to have that question decided by the Senate; that, until the same shall have been decided, I do not wish to be at the trouble and expense of collecting evidence at a great distance; and, therefore, that at present, I do not mean to produce any testimony, reserving, however, to myself the right which I conceive I have to produce any testimony in my favor, after the said question shall have been decided by the Senate, in case it is decided against me.

"ALBERT GALLATIN."

"Which being duly read and considered, the Committee came to the following resolution, to wit:

"Whereas the evidence on the part of the petitioners having been closed, and it appearing that Mr. Gallatin was an alien in the year 1780; and his answer, in writing, assigning reasons why he should not adduce evidence on his part in the present stage of the inquiry, not being, in the opinion of the Committee, sufficient, it is now incumbent on Mr. Gallatin to show that he has become a citizen of the United States, and when informed the Committee he should rely on the answer he had before given.

"All which is respectfully submitted to the honorable Senate by the Committee."

And subjoined is the statement of facts exhibited by Mr. Gallatin, and agreed to between him and the counsel for the petitioners, as mentioned the 20th instant:

"Albert Gallatin was born at Geneva, on the 29th day of January, 1761. He left that place for the United States in April or May, 1780, arrived in Boston (Massachusetts) on the 14th or 15th July of the same year, and has ever since resided within the United States. In October, 1780, he removed from Boston to Machias in the Province of Maine, in which place and its neighborhood, he resided one year, and commenced a settlement on a tract of vacant land. During that time, he furnished, out of his own funds, supplies (amounting in value to more than sixty pounds Massachusetts currency) to Colonel John Allen, who was the commanding officer stationed there, and also Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Eastern Department, for the use of the American troops, and on several occasions acted as a volunteer under the same officer's command. For the said supplies, he received, one year after, a warrant on the Treasury of the State of Massachusetts, which he sold at a considerable depreciation. In October, 1781, he returned to Boston; and, in the spring of 1782, was, by a vote of the Corporation of the University of Cambridge, (otherwise called Harvard College,) chosen instructor of the French language of the said University.

By the same vote he was allowed a room in the College, the privilege of the Commons at the Tutor's table, the use of the Library, and also the right of having his pay (which depended on the voluntary subscription and attendance of the students) collected by the steward of the institution, together with the other charges against the students for board and education. Those terms he accepted, and remained in that station for the term of one year: In July, 1783, he removed to Pennsylvania, and in November of the same year proceeded to Virginia, in which State he had purchased more than one thousand acres of land, (and amounting to more than one hundred pounds Virginia currency in value,) some time between July and November, 1783. Between this last mentioned period and the month of October, 1785, he purchased other lands in the said State to a very large amount, and in the said last mentioned month he took an oath of allegiance to the said State. In December, 1785, he purchased the plantation in Fayette county in Pennsylvania, on which he has lived ever since. In October, 1789, he was elected member of the Convention to amend the Constitution of Pennsylvania, and in October, 1790, 1791, and 1792, he was elected member of the Legislature of the same State. On the 28th of February, 1793, he was chosen Senator to represent the said State in the Senate of the United States, and took his seat in December following."

appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the first amendment of the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines and for other purposes, and asking a conference on all the amendments. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the proposed conference, and that Messrs. GUNN, BRADLEY, and ELLSWORTH be managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The two Letters which I now forward to Congress were written by a Consul of the United States, and contain information which will, probably, be thought to require some pecuniary provision.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 25, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The consideration of the report of the committee on the bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of amendment," was resumed, adopted with amendment, and it was agreed that the bill be amended accordingly.

FRIDAY, March 28.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of Kensey Johns, appointed by the Executive of the State of Delaware to be a Senator of the United States; which report is as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of an appointment by the Governor of the State of Delaware, of Kensey Johns, as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report—

"That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat upon the 18th day of December, 1793, and during the recess of the Legislature of said State.

"That the Legislature of the said State met in January, and adjourned in February, 1794.

"That, upon the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said Legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed, by the Governor of said State, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid. Whereupon, the Committee submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the Governor of the State of Delaware, as a Senator of the United States, for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States; a session of the Legislature of the said State having intervened, between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns."

On the question to agree to this report, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradford, Bradley, Brown, Burr, Butler, Cabot, Edwards, Ellsworth, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Hawkins, Jackson, King, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mitchell, Monroe, Robinson, and Taylor.

NAYS.—Messrs. Foster, Iard, Morris, Potts, Rubenfeld, Strong, and Vining.

Resolved, That an attested copy of the resolution of the Senate, on the appointment of Kensey Johns to be a Senator of the United States, be transmitted, by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, to the Executive of the State of Delaware.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In the execution of the resolution of Congress, bearing date the 25th of March, 1794, and imposing an embargo, I have requested the Governors of the several States to call forth the force of their militia, if it should be necessary, for the detention of vessels. This power is conceived to be incidental to an embargo.

It also deserves the attention of Congress, how far the clearances from one district to another, under the law as it now stands, may give rise to evasions of the embargo. As one security, the collectors have been instructed to refuse to receive the surrender of coasting licenses for the purpose of taking out registers, and to require bond from registered vessels, bound from one district to another, for the delivery of the cargo within the United States.

It is not understood that the resolution applies to fishing vessels, although their occupations lie generally in parts beyond the United States. But, without further restrictions, there is an opportunity of their privileges being used as means of eluding the embargo.

All armed vessels, possessing public commissions from any foreign Power, (letters of marque excepted,) are considered as not liable to the embargo.

These circumstances are transmitted to Congress for their consideration.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 28, 1794.

Ordered, That the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of this day, be referred to Messrs. BURR, MORRIS, and LANGDON, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

As the Letter which I forwarded to Congress on the 15th day of April last, from the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty to the Secretary of State, in answer to a memorial of our Minister in London, related to a very interesting subject, I thought it proper not to delay its communication. But, since that time, the memorial itself has been received, in a Letter from our Minister, and a reply has been made to that answer by the Secretary of State. Copies of them are, therefore, now transmitted.

I also send the copy of a Letter from the Governor of Rhode Island, enclosing an Act of the Legislature of that State, empowering the United States to hold lands within the same for the purpose of erecting fortifications; and certain papers concerning patents for the donation lands to the ancient settlers of Vincennes upon the Wabash.

G. WASHINGTON.

GUNN, ELLSWORTH, KING, LIVERMORE, and MORRIS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In the communications which I have made to Congress during the present session relative to foreign nations, I have omitted no opportunity of testifying my anxiety to preserve the United States in peace. It is peculiarly, therefore, my duty, at this time to lay before you the present state of certain hostile threats against the territories of Spain in our neighborhood.

The documents which accompany this message develop the measures which I have taken to suppress them, and the intelligence which has lately been received.

It will be seen from thence that the subject has not been neglected; that every power vested in the Executive on such occasions has been exerted; and that there was reason to believe that the enterprise projected against the Spanish dominions was relinquished.

But it appears to have been revived upon principles which set public order at defiance, and place the peace of the United States in the discretion of unauthorized individuals. The means already deposited in the different departments of Government are shown, by experience, not to be adequate to these high exigencies, although such of them as are lodged in the hands of the Executive shall continue to be used with promptness, energy, and decision, proportioned to the case. But I am impelled, by the position of our public affairs, to recommend that provision be made for a stronger and more vigorous opposition than can be given to such hostile movements under the laws as they now stand.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, May 20, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. CABOT, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States upon a final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States," reported an additional section; and the report was read.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, in confidence, sundry papers by which you will perceive the state of affairs between us and the Six Nations, and the probable cause to which it is owing; and also certain information, whereby it would appear that some encroachment was about to be made on our territory by an officer and party of British troops. Proceeding upon a supposition of the authenticity of this information, although of a private nature, I have caused the representation to be made to the British Minister, a copy of which accompanied this Message.

It cannot be necessary to comment upon the very serious nature of such an encroachment, nor to urge that this new state of things suggests the propriety of placing the United States in a posture of effectual preparation for an event which, notwithstanding the endeavors making to avert it, may, by circumstances beyond our control, be forced upon us.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May 21, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

And the report was adopted.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

I send you certain communications, recently received from Georgia, which materially change the prospect of affairs in that quarter, and seem to render a war with the Creek nations more probable than it has been at any antecedent period. While the attention of Congress will be directed to the consideration of measures suited to the exigency, it cannot escape their observation that this intelligence brings a fresh proof of the insufficiency of the existing provisions of the laws, towards the effectual cultivation and preservation of peace with our Indian neighbors.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 2, 1794.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms upon any land belonging to Indians out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State or the Territory aforesaid, for the purpose or with the intent of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations on any Indian town, or person, or property, shall thereby become subject to the Rules and Articles of War, which are, or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States."

It passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Burr, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Jackson, Martin, and Rosa. NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Hawkins, King, Livermore, Morris, Potts, and Vining.

On motion to agree to a 7th section, reported by the committee, as follows:

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That if the President of the United States shall deem the same conducive to the good of the public service, he be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a Major General to command the troops authorized by this act, who shall receive the same pay and allowances as are granted to a Major General by the act, entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States.'"

It passed in the negative.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act supplementary to 'The act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers,'" and a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act, entitled 'An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States and for other purposes,'" in which several bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They insist on one and recede from other amendments disagreed to by the Senate on the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

Mr. GUNN reported, from the managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels." Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate so far recede from their amendment to the first section, as that the duty on coal stand at one half cent per bushel. They also recede from their last amendment to the first section, which was to strike out the words "except window glass."

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts," was read a third time.

FRIDAY, June 6.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers," was read the third time.

On motion it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to strike out these words from the second section reported by the committee, to wit: "after their enlistment."

On motion, it was agreed further to amend the second section reported by the committee, by inserting these words after "dollars": "one-half to be paid immediately after enlistment, the other half at the end of three months thereafter."

On motion, it was agreed further to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section reported by the committee.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have resolved, that the Committee of Enrolments be authorized to amend the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," by striking out the word "next," in the first section, and, in lieu thereof, inserting the word "instant;" also, by making a corresponding alteration throughout the bill, and by striking out, in the title thereof, the words "and on the tonnage of ship or vessels;" and that the engrossed bill be amended conformably thereto; and that the concurrence of the Senate be requested, by message, in this resolution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution last mentioned, and,

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

Mr. RUTHERFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for determining the Northern boundary of the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina," reported that the bill do not pass, and the report was adopted. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do not concur in this bill.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts," was read a third time.

SENATE.]

Proceedings.

[JUNE, 1794.]

On motion, it was agreed to strike out the word "Delaware" from the second section, also the following words in the same section, "and in Delaware on the third Monday in June."

Also to add, at the end of the section, "And that the Circuit Court of the District of Delaware hereafter commence on the second Monday in June, instead of the 27th day of April; any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

Also, to amend the 3d and 4th sections of the bill.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments. The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for the relief of Nicholas Reib," was read; and, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with, and the bill was read a second and third time, and passed.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, the act entitled 'An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes,'" was read.

On the question, Shall this bill be read a second time? it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate do not concur in this bill.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to continue in force for a limited time, 'The act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers,'" was read; and, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with, and it was agreed that the bill have at this time a second and third reading.

to said bill, and that a conference be desired on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that Messrs. KING, ELLSWORTH, and PORTS, be managers at the same on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House agree to the proposed conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers," and have appointed managers at the same on their part.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed," was read; and it was agreed to dispense with the rule, and that this bill be now read the second time.

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. CANOT, ROSS, and ELLSWORTH, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

The report of the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing for the payment of a certain sum of money due to the French Republic," was read, as follows:

"It appears, by a statement of the account between the United States and France, reported to the House of Representatives, that, according to the view which is entertained at the Treasury of that account, the United States, on the first day of January, 1794, were in advance to France the sum of two millions one hundred eleven thousand and eighty-six livres tournois and five deniers (being $383,162 11) beyond the instalments of principal and all interest which had accrued to that period.

"It further appears, upon inquiry at the Treasury, that, since that period, there has been advanced on account of our Debt to France the further sum of seventy-one thousand two hundred and forty-two dollars and eighty-one cents.

"And it appears, likewise, from the papers referred to the committee, that the President has promised further payment upon the same account of 1,600,000 livres on the third of September next, and of 1,000,000 of livres on the 5th of November next, making together 453,750 dollars, which payments, it is understood, may be anticipated at the Bank of the United States, in the proportions and at the epochs which are desired by the Minister of the French Republic.

"These sums embrace all the parts of principal which, by contract, would become payable to France during the year 1794; beyond which, were there no anticipations, nothing would be demandable during the present year but the interest on the balance of the entire Debt, which balance, on the first day of January, 1794, is computed at the Treasury at $2,611,587 88; whence it results that the payments which have been made, and engaged to be made, exceed those which by the terms of contract could be demanded.

"This being the case, and the Loan in question having been in its origin specifically appropriated to the purpose of the Sinking Fund;

"It is the opinion of the committee, that it is not advisable to divert it from its destination, as is proposed by the bill referred to them; and consequently, that the bill should not pass."

On motion, it was agreed to adopt the report of the committee.

On motion, that the bill last reported on be considered in paragraphs, it passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Burr, Hawkins, Henry, Jackson, Martin, and Ross.
NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, King, Livermore, Morris, Potts, Rutherford, and Vining.

And so the bill was rejected.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a "resolve directing the respective Clerks of the District Courts of the United States to return copies of the tables of fees payable in the Supreme or Superior Court of the State in which he resides, to the Attorney General;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolve last brought from the House of Representatives for concurrence was read.

Resolved, That the Senate concur therein.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows and families of certain deceased clerks." They have appointed a committee to join such committee as shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution last mentioned; and,

Resolved, That they do concur therein, and that Messrs. VIXING and KING be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows and families of certain deceased clerks," was read; and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill be now read the second time.

Ordered, That this bill be referred to Messrs. ROSS, BRADFORD, and MORRIS, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. ROSS, from the committee last mentioned, reported that the consideration of this bill be postponed until the next session of Congress; and the report was adopted. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this bill do not pass.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of George Nixon and others, clerks in the Auditor's office, reported a bill, which was read, and the rule was dispensed with by unanimous consent, and the bill was read the second time.

On motion to amend the bill it passed in the negative, and the bill being read by paragraphs, it was ordered to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives agree to some amendments, and disagree to other amendments, of the Senate on the bill, entitled "An act making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts."

SENATE.]

Proceedings.

[JUNE, 1794.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives on the bill last mentioned; and

Resolved, That they agree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to their amendments, and recede from their own amendments to the fourth section of the said bill.

Mr. Vining reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and acquainted him with the intended recess of Congress on the 9th instant.

Mr. King, from the managers at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers," reported that they could come to no agreement with the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House adhere to their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers."

Resolved, That the Senate adhere to their amendments to the bill last mentioned.

So the bill was lost.

Mr. Casor, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed," reported that the bill pass without amendment; which report was adopted; and, the bill being read in paragraphs, it was ordered to a third reading.

MONDAY, June 9.

On motion, the rule was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with, and Mr. King obtained permission to introduce a bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontiers; and the bill had its first and second reading.

On the question to agree to the first section of the bill, which is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, unless it shall be the opinion of the President of the United States, that a regiment of the troops heretofore authorized to be raised, may, consistently with the good of the public service, be employed for the protection of the Southwestern frontier, he be, and hereby is, authorized to cause to be raised for three years, unless sooner discharged, within the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, the Territory South of the Ohio, and the State of Virginia, an additional regiment of infantry, consisting of one thousand one hundred and forty non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates, and solely to appoint the commissioned officers thereof, and to organize the same according to the present Military Establishment."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Hawkins, Henry, Jackson, King, Lavermore, Morris, Potts, Rutherford, and Vining.

NAIS.—Messrs. Brown, Burr, Martin, and Ross.

On motion by Mr. Jackson, to postpone the last section of the bill, which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That all persons who shall be assembled or embodied in arms upon any land belonging to Indians, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of any State, or of the said Territory South of the Ohio, for the purpose of warring against the Indians, or of committing depredations upon any Indian town, or persons or property, shall thereby become liable and subject to the Rules and Articles of War which are, or shall be established for the government of the troops of the United States."

For the purpose of substituting the following:

"And be it further enacted, That any militia officer of the United States, or either of the States, conducting, authorizing, or attending, any expedition over the present boundary line between the respective States and any Indian tribe or nation, except in the pursuit of persons or property of the citizens of the United States, for the purpose of attacking their Indian towns, or destroying their persons, or to commit other depredations on their rights, shall, in addition to the pains or penalties the law of the United States now subjects him to, be liable to a trial by a General Court-martial, to be ordered by the Executive of the State or Territory to which such officer shall belong, and whose duty it is hereby declared to be, to order such Court-martial, and shall, if found guilty thereof, be cashiered, and be forever thereafter disqualified from holding any commission in the militia of the United States, or of either of the States."

It passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown, Burr, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Jackson, Martin, and Ross.

NAIS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Hawkins, King, Lavermore, Morris, Potts, Rutherford, and Vining.

On motion that this bill be now read a third time by unanimous consent, it was not agreed to.

The bill for the further compensation of clerks in the Auditor's office, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion to rescind the resolution of both Houses, that Congress adjourn on this day, and to agree to adjourn on Wednesday next, it passed in the negative.

The President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, with his specie account for the quarter ending the 31st of March last; which were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House, having finished the business of the session, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives, that the Senate likewise, having finished the business of the session, are about to adjourn; and he, having reported that he had delivered the message, the President of the Senate, conformably to the resolution of the 5th instant, adjourned the Senate to the day appointed by law for the next meeting of Congress.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE THIRD CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 2, 1793.

From Maryland.—GEORGE DENT, and SAMUEL SMITH.

From Virginia.—WILLIAM B. GILES, CARTER B. HARRISON, JOHN HEATH, RICHARD BLAND LEE, JAMES MADISON, ANDREW MOORE, ANTHONY NEW, JOHN NICHOLAS, FRANCIS PRESTON, ROBERT RUTHERFORD, ABRAHAM VENABLE, and FRANCIS WALKER.

From Kentucky.—CHRISTOPHER GREENUP.

From North Carolina.—THOMAS BLOUNT, WILLIAM JOHNSON DAWSON, MATTHEW LOCKE, NATHANIEL MACON, and ALEXANDER MEDANE.

From South Carolina.—WILLIAM SMITH.

From Georgia.—ABRAHAM BALDWIN and THOMAS P. CAENES.

A quorum of the members being present, the House proceeded to ballot for a Speaker, when it appeared that FREDERICK A. MUILENBERG, one of the members from Pennsylvania, was elected; whereupon he was conducted to the Chair, and made his acknowledgments to the House.

The House then proceeded, in the same manner, to the appointment of a Clerk, when JOHN BECKLEY was appointed.

The usual oath was then administered to the members.

Messages were interchanged between the two Houses, announcing their formation and readiness to proceed to business.

Joseph Wheaton was appointed Sergeant-at-Arms, Gifford Dally as Doorkeeper, and Thomas Claxton as Assistant Doorkeeper.

A joint committee was appointed by the two Houses to wait on the President of the United States, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication that he may think proper to make to them.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

Resolved, That a standing Committee of Elections be appointed; also a committee to report rules and orders of proceeding.

TUESDAY, December 3.

JOSEPH McDOWELL and BENJAMIN WILLIAMS, from North Carolina, appeared and took their seats.

A message from the Senate announced their readiness to receive the communication from the President of the United States. The SPEAKER and members withdrew to the Senate Chamber, where the President attended and delivered his Speech to the two Houses, which will be found in the proceedings of the Senate, page 10.

On the return of the members, the Speech was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message was received from the President, with a copy of his Proclamation and of the Rules prescribed by him for the government of the Executive Officers in executing the Treaties between the United States and Foreign Powers, referred to in the President's Speech. [For copies of these papers, see the Appendix.]

The Senate informed the House that they had appointed the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE Chaplain.

And the House proceeded to elect their Chaplain. The Reverend ASHBEL GREEN was their choice.

WEDNESDAY, December 4.

PELEG COFFIN, JR., from Massachusetts; WILLIAM MONTGOMERY, from Pennsylvania; and WILLIAM VANS MURRAY, from Maryland, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to them by the SPEAKER, according to law.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Speech under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that a respectful Address ought to be presented by the House of Representatives to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of this session, containing assurances that this House will take into consideration the various and important matters recommended to their attention.

Ordered, That Messrs. MADISON, SEDGWICK, WATTS, HARTLEY, and SAMUEL SMITH, be appointed a committee to prepare an Address pursuant to the said resolution.

Resolved, That this House will, to-morrow, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said Speech.

A petition of Henry Latimer, of the State of Delaware, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN PATTON, to serve as a member of this House for the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

TREATY WITH THE INDIANS.

A communication was received from the War Department, consisting of a copy of the instructions given to the Commissioners for treating with the Indians North of the Ohio; the Journal of those Commissioners, and a list of the officers in the service of the United States.

Some objection was at first made to reading the two first communications, but was afterwards waived.

The instructions were then read. They premise, that it appears a great majority of the people of the United States are averse to the Indian war, and wish for peace with the savages if it can be obtained on just and honorable terms. They contemplate the treaty at Fort Harmar as valid, and the sales made there, good. They propose offering the hostile Indians, if they should come to terms of accommodation, the guarantee of the United States against any impositions of her citizens. The Commissioners were empowered to promise $50,000 worth of goods and an annual present of $10,000, if the hostile tribes should agree to terms. They were instructed to prevent, if possible, a confederacy of the Indians; to secure and explain the nature of our right of pre-emption to their lands, and to admit no British agents to the treaty as mediators; they might, however, attend the treaty as spectators, as the United States, wishing to deal fairly with the Indian tribes, and secure an honorable peace, did not care who witnessed the transaction.

Some objections were started to reading the Journal with open galleries until the nature of it was known. After a short conversation upon the propriety of reading it privately, a motion to adjourn was made and carried.

THURSDAY, December 5.

FISHER AMES and DWIGHT FOSTER, from Massachusetts; and NATHANIEL NILES, from Vermont, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War, yesterday, and went through the same.

Ordered, That the said papers be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

As the present situation of the several Nations of Europe, and especially of those with which the United States have important relations, cannot but render the state of things, between them and us, matter of interesting inquiry to the Legislature, and may, indeed, give rise to deliberations to which they alone are competent, I have thought it my duty to communicate to them certain correspondences which have taken place.

The Representative and Executive bodies of France have manifested, generally, a friendly attachment to this country; have given advantages to our commerce and navigation, and have made overtures for placing these advantages on permanent ground; a decree, however, of the National Assembly, subjecting vessels laden with provisions to be carried into their ports, and making enemy goods lawful prize, in the vessel of a friend, contrary to our treaty, though revoked at one time, as to the United States, has been since extended to their vessels also, as has been recently stated to us. Representations on this subject will be immediately given in charge to our Minister there, and the result shall be communicated to the Legislature.

It is with extreme concern I have to inform you, that the proceedings of the person whom they have unfortunately appointed their Minister Plenipotentiary here, have breathed nothing of the friendly spirit of the Nation which sent him; their tendency, on the contrary, has been to involve us in war abroad, and discord and anarchy at home. So far as his acts, or those of his agents, have threatened our immediate commitment in the war, or flagrant insult to the authority of the laws, their effect has been counteracted by the ordinary cognizance of the laws, and by an exertion of the powers confided to me. Where their danger was not imminent, they have been borne with, from sentiments of regard to his Nation; from a sense of their friendship towards us; from a conviction that they would not suffer us to remain long exposed to the action of a person who has so little respected our mutual dispositions; and I will add, from a reliance on the firmness of my fellow-citizens, in their principles of peace and order. In the mean time, I have respected and pursued the stipulations of our treaties according to what I judged their true sense; and have withheld no act of friendship which their affairs have called for from us, and which justice to others left us free to perform. I have gone further. Rather than employ force for the restitution of certain vessels which I deemed the United States bound to restore, I thought it more advisable to satisfy the parties, by avowing it to be my opinion, that, if restitution were not made, it would be incumbent on the United States to make compensation. The papers now communicated will more particularly apprise you of these transactions.

The vexations and spoliations understood to have been committed on our vessels and commerce, by the cruisers and officers of some of the belligerent Powers, appeared to require attention. The proofs of these, however, not having been brought forward, the description of citizens supposed to have suffered, were notified that, on furnishing them to the Executive, due measures would be taken to obtain redress of the past, and more effectual provisions against the future. Should such documents be furnished, proper representations will be made thereon, with a just reliance on a redress proportioned to the exigency of the case.

The British Government having undertaken, by orders of the Commanders of their armed vessels, to restrain, generally, our commerce, in corn and other provisions, to their own ports and those of their friends, the instructions now communicated were immediately forwarded to our Minister at that Court. In the mean time, some discussions on the subject took place between him and them; these are also laid before you; and I may expect to learn the result of his special instructions, in time to make it known to the Legislature during their present session.

Very early after the arrival of a British Minister here, mutual explanations on the execution of the Treaty of Peace were entered into with that Minister; these are now laid before you for your information.

On the subjects of mutual interest between this country and Spain, negotiations and conferences are now depending. The public good requiring that the present state of these should be made known to the Legislature, in confidence only, they shall be the subject of a separate and subsequent communication.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 5, 1793.

The PRESIDENT sent, also, a copy of the report of the late Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, stating the balances due to and from the respective States.

The Message and Communications from the PRESIDENT were partly read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented an address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 6.

JAMES HILLHOUSE, from Connecticut, and JOSIAH PARKER, from Virginia, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Standing Committee of Elections, reported that the Committee had, in part, examined the certificates and other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and had agreed upon a report; which was read, and is as follows:

"It appears to your Committee, that the credentials of the following members are sufficient to entitle them to take their seats, in the House, to wit:

[After enumerating the names of the members whose credentials were examined, the report concludes:]

"Your Committee further report that, in the case of JOHN PATTON, returned as a member for the State of Delaware, the Executive of the said State have, together with the return, transmitted a protest, made to them by Henry Latimer, of the said State, against the return of the said JOHN PATTON."

Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Address under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Resolved, unanimously, That this House doth agree to the said Address, in the words following:

Sir: The Representatives of the people of the United States, in meeting you for the first time since you have been again called, by an unanimous suffrage, to your present station, find an occasion, which they embrace with no less sincerity than promptitude, for expressing to you their congratulations on so distinguished a testimony of public approbation, and their entire confidence in the purity and patriotism of the motives which have produced this obedience to the voice of your country. It is to virtues which have commanded long and universal reverence, and services from which have flowed great and lasting benefits, that the tribute of praise may be paid without the reproach of flattery; and it is from the same sources that the fairest anticipations may be derived in favor of the public happiness.

The United States having taken no part in the war which had embraced in Europe the Powers with whom they have the most extensive relations, the maintenance of peace was justly to be regarded as one of the most important duties of the Magistrate charged with the faithful execution of the laws. We accordingly witness, with approbation and pleasure, the vigilance with which you have guarded against an interruption of that blessing, by your Proclamation, admonishing our citizens of the consequences of illicit or hostile acts towards the belligerent parties; and promoting, by a declaration of the existing legal state of things, an easier admission of our right to the immunities belonging to our situation.

The connexion of the United States with Europe has evidently become extremely interesting. The communications which remain to be exhibited to us will, no doubt, assist in giving us a fuller view of the subject, and in guiding our deliberations to such results as may comport with the rights and true interests of our country. We learn, with deep regret, that the measures, dictated by a love of peace, for obtaining an amicable termination of the afflicting war on our frontiers, have been frustrated, and that a resort to offensive measures should have again become necessary. As the latter, however, must be rendered more satisfactory, in proportion to the solicitude for peace, manifested by the former, it is to be hoped they will be pursued under the better auspices, on that account, and be finally crowned with more happy success.

In relation to the particular tribe of Indians against whom offensive measures have been prohibited, as well as on all the other important subjects which you have presented to our view, we shall bestow the attention which they claim. We cannot, however, refrain, at this time, from particularly expressing our concurrence in your anxiety for the regular discharge of the Public Debt, as fast as circumstances and events will permit, and in the policy of removing any impediments that may be found in the way of a faithful representation of public proceedings throughout the United States, being persuaded, with you, that on no subject more than the former can delay be more injurious, or an economy of time more valuable; and that, with respect to the latter, no resource is so firm for the Government of the United States as the affections of the people, guided by an enlightened policy.

Throughout our deliberations we shall endeavor to cherish every sentiment which may contribute to render them conducive to the dignity as well as to the welfare of the United States. And we join with you in imploring that Being on whose will the fate of nations depends, to crown with success our mutual endeavors.

Resolved, That Mr. SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. HARTLEY, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

A petition of Henry K. Van Rensselaer, of the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undup election and return of John E. Van Allen, to serve as a member of this House for the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The House resumed the reading of the Message and communications received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and made a further progress therein.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, reported that the committee had waited on the PRESIDENT, who signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said Address at 12 o'clock, to-morrow, at his own house.

SATURDAY, December 7.

PELEG WADSWORTH, from Massachusetts, and JOSEPH NEVILLE, from Virginia, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER, attended by the House, then withdrew to the house of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and there presented to him the Address of this House, in answer to his speech to both Houses of Congress; to which the PRESIDENT made the following Reply:

GENTLEMEN: I shall not affect to conceal the cordial satisfaction which I derive from the Address of the House of Representatives. Whatsoever those services may be which you have sanctioned by your favor, it is a sufficient reward that they have been accepted as they were meant. For the fulfilment of your anticipations of the future, I can give no other assurance than that the motives which you approve shall continue unchanged. It is truly gratifying to me to learn that the Proclamation has been considered as a seasonable guard against the interruption of the public peace. Nor can I doubt that the subjects which I have recommended to your attention as depending on Legislative provisions, will receive a discussion suited to their importance. With every reason, then, it may be expected that your deliberations, under the Divine blessing, will be matured to the honor and happiness of the United States.

G. WASHINGTON.

The House resumed the reading of the communications received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on Thursday last, and made a further progress therein.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his accounts of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the 1st of January to the 31st of March, 1793, inclusive; also, of his payments and receipts on account of the War Department, from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1793, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 9.

GABRIEL CHRISTIE, from Maryland, THOMAS CLAIBORNE and GEORGE HANCOCK, from Virginia, JOSEPH WINSTON, from North Carolina, JOHN HUNTER and ANDREW PICKENS, from South Carolina, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

The House resumed the reading of the Communications received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on Thursday last, and made a further progress therein.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry K. Van Rensselaer, of the State of New York, complaining of an undup election and return of John E. Van Allen, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 10.

The House resumed the reading of the Communications received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on Thursday last, and made a further progress therein.

Ordered, That the petition of Henry Latimer, of the State of Delaware, complaining of an undue election and return of John Patton, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, which lay on the table, be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

WEDNESDAY, December 11.

BENJAMIN BOURNE and FRANCIS MALBONE, from Rhode Island, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

The House resumed the reading of the Communications received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on Thursday last, and went through the same.

Ordered, That the said Communications be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Speech under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read and agreed to by the House, as follow:

1st. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States.

2d. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what, amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act for establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States.

3d. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. BOUNDINOT, Mr. PETER MUEHLBERG, Mr. PARKER, Mr. CARNES, and Mr. BLOUNT, be a committee pursuant to the first resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. COBB, Mr. SHERBURN, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. PICKENS, be a committee pursuant to the second resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. TRACY, Mr. GLENN, Mr. CLARK, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DENT, Mr. WALKER, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. HUNTER, be a committee pursuant to the third resolution.

Resolved, That this House will, on Friday next, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said Speech.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the 1st of April to the 30th of June, 1793, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUNDINOT, from the committee appointed to examine the Journal of the last session, and to report therefrom all such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to examine the laws of the United States, and report to the House such as have expired, or will expire, before the next session; and that Mr. BOUNDINOT, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. KIRKENDALL, be the said committee.

FRIDAY, December 13.

THOMAS TREDEWELL, from New York, and JOHN PATTON, from Delaware, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Speech under consideration, and made a further progress therein.

Resolved, That this House will, on Monday next, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said Speech.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and that Mr. GILES, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. BOUNDINOT, be the said committee.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to make provision for the renewal of destroyed certificates of Debt of the United States; and that Mr. LEE, Mr. COBBIN, and Mr. BEATTY, be the said committee.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for the relief of sick and disabled seamen; and that Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. WATTS, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. WINSTON, and Mr. MALBONE, be the said committee.

MONDAY, December 16.

SAMUEL DEXTER, Junior, from Massachusetts, JOSHUA COIR and ZEPHANIAH SWIFT, from Connecticut, and RICHARD WINN, from South Carolina, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting that a new inquiry into his official conduct may be instituted, in some mode most effectual for an accurate and thorough investigation; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a return of the ordnance, arms, and military stores, in possession of the United States; also, a variety of papers, from A to L, inclusive, giving a view of the Southwestern frontiers, as connected with the Creeks and the State of Georgia and the Southwestern Territory of the United States. The said Letter and Communications were partly read.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the act "To establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," and report some provisions in the case, where any Judge of the Courts of the United States is, or may, by sickness or other disqualifying cause, be rendered incapable of discharging the duties of his office; also, some further provision concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; and, generally, to report such amendments to the said act as they may judge necessary and Constitutional; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. MOORE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CHRISTIE, be the said committee.

A message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, communicating certain confidential communications respecting the transactions of the Government of the United States with Spain.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a report of the Secretary of State on the measures which have been taken, on behalf of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining a recognition of our Treaty with Morocco, and for the ransom of our citizens and establishment of peace with Algiers.

While it is proper our citizens should know that subjects which so much concern their interests and their feelings have duly engaged the attention of their Legislature and Executive, it would still be improper that some particulars of this communication should be made known. The confidential conversation stated in one of the last Letters, sent herewith, is one of these. Both justice and policy require that the source of that information should remain secret, as a knowledge of the same might have been given for peace and ransom proceedings for the same objects.

G. WASHINGTON.

TUESDAY, December 17.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, stating the amount of purchase and other proceedings since their last report; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to the reading of the confidential communications received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners and establishment of peace with the Algerines, and went through the same.

The House then proceeded to the reading of the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the transactions of the Government of the United States with Spain, and made some progress therein.

WEDNESDAY, December 18.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry K. Van Rensselaer, of the State of New York, complaining of an undue election and return of John E. Van Allen, to serve as a member of this House for the said State, made a further report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Ordered, That the confidential communications received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES on Monday last, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners and establishment of peace with the Algerines, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

The House resumed the reading of the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the transactions of the Government of the United States with Spain, and made a further progress therein.

THURSDAY, December 19.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and accompanied with an explanatory Letter to him from the Comptroller of the Treasury; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying further communications respecting the Southwestern frontiers, as connected with the Creeks, and the State of Georgia, and the Southwestern Territory of the United States.

Ordered, That the said Letter and Communications do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying a report on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries, made pursuant to a resolution of the House of the twenty-third of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; which was read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House to whom are committed the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners and establishment of peace with the Algerines.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire into and report a state of facts respecting sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States, and their opinion on the propriety of remitting the foreign tonnage thereon; and that Mr. VENABLE, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. LYMAN, be the said committee.

The House resumed the reading of the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT respecting the transactions of the Government of the United States with Spain, and went through the same.

Ordered, That the said communications be committed to the Committee of the Whole House to whom are committed the confidential communications respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners and establishment of peace with the Algerines.

FRIDAY, December 20.

WILLIAM HINDMAN, from Maryland, and SAMUEL GRIFFIN, from Virginia, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats.

CONTESTED ELECTION

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections respecting the election of Mr. J. E. Van Allen. The petition of Mr. Henry Van Rensselaer, the two reports of the Committee of Elections, and the election law of the State of New York, were read by the Clerk.

Mr. LEE stated a number of facts as connected with this subject, and added the following questions, viz.:

1. Whether irregularities not deemed by the law of New York sufficient to nullify the votes given shall be regarded by the House of Representatives as having that effect? None of the irregularities (observed Mr. LEE) were regarded by the law of New York as sufficient to vitiate the returns of votes made by the inspectors, who are sworn officers, and subject to pains and penalties for failure of duty. If the law of New York is to be observed as a sovereign rule on this occasion, the allegations do not state any facts so material as to require the interference of the House of Representatives.

2. Whether, setting aside this first principle, mere irregularities not alleged to have proceeded from corruption, shall nullify the return of sworn officers; and whether the House of Representatives ought to countenance and inquire into the mere implications of such serious crimes as perjury and corruption, or should require such charges to be expressly and specifically made?

3. Whether it is not an indispensable requisite to the existence of a Representative Government that at every election a choice should be made?

4. Whether, to insure such choice, it be not necessary that this principle should be established: that a majority of legal votes, legally given, should decide the issue of an election?

5. Whether, therefore, partial corruption should be deemed sufficient to nullify an election, or only sufficient to vitiate the votes given under such corruption, leaving the election to be decided by the sound votes, however few?

6. Whether, if partial corruption should be deemed sufficient to nullify an election, such corruption should not extend to the major part of the votes given, and if the major part of the votes be deemed sound, the fate of the election should not depend on the plurality of votes in such major part?

Mr. LEE observed, that this last was the opinion of the committee, and they have stated facts according to this opinion, and finding a major part of the votes duly given and canvassed, and that J. E. Van Allen had a plurality of such major part, they have determined that he was duly returned to serve in the present Congress.

A variety of objections were offered to the report of the Committee of Elections; that it did not contain so full a statement of facts as would warrant the Committee of the Whole in deciding on the merits on the election. Sundry allegations of the petition devolved inquiries on the part of the Committee which not only affected the purity of elections, but the privileges of the House, and their right to judge of the qualifications of its members. These inquiries might enable the Committee to determine the number of votes actually given, and the validity of those votes. That the act of the State of New York should be suffered to operate in this case so as to exclude from the House a knowledge of the full amount of the number of votes given, appeared very extraordinary. The respective Houses of Congress possess exclusively the right to judge of the qualifications of their own members. This right includes evidently full power to ascertain with precision the actual state of the polls. If the votes of the citizens freely and fairly given can, under any pretext whatever, be suppressed, the essential rights of suffrage are at an end. It was observed, that corruption in elections was the door at which corruption would creep into the House; that it appeared to be admitted there had been irregularities in some of the towns in the district in question; but it had been made a question—not whether corruption generally should vitiate an election—but what quantum should be sufficient for that purpose; so that corruption was considered, in relation to an election, by weight or measure. The allegations of the petition were urged in support of these objections. These stated sundry irregularities in relation to the returns not corresponding with the numbers of votes given in several towns; the boxes not being properly secured which conveyed the votes to the canvassing committee—one of which had been deposited in the house of the sitting member for a number of hours, &c.

In support of the Committee of Election's report, it was observed, that the allegations in the petition showed that the principal support it rested on was, that the returning officers of some of the towns in the district from which the sitting member came, had rejected a number of votes given in for the petitioner. It was shown, from the provisions of the election law of New York that these votes might have been legally rejected. The petition stated that numbers of persons had sworn that they had voted for the petitioner, whose votes, by the returns, it does not appear were counted. On this, it was observed, that the Committee did not consider this allegation of a nature proper to engage their attention. It was presumed that the House of Representatives would never institute an inquiry into such a species of evidence. It was extremely difficult for a man to swear that he had positively voted by ballot for a particular candidate, since it is well known that persons had, on such occasions, frequently put in a ballot for the person he had not intended to vote for. In the hurry and confusion which often take place, the ballots get shifted, and one is put in in lieu of another. To the objection to the law of the State of New York, drawn from the Constitution of the United States, it was replied, that the regulating the "time, place and manner" of holding elections is expressly vested in the State Legislatures. These necessarily include a great variety of incidental circumstances, which must also be left to their discretion. Congress cannot enter into a consideration of the minutiae of the elections. The different customs of the several States will not admit of one uniform system. With respect to the box which contained part of the votes having been deposited in the house of the sitting member, it was observed that no imputation was conveyed against him in the petition on that account. It did not appear that the number of votes it contained had been either increased or diminished: nor was there any charge against him of being accessory to any unfair practices in the election. The Committee had taken cognizance of every fact that had come into their possession, and the result was before the Committee of the Whole.

It was further stated by one of the Committee of Elections, that the only question to be determined was, whether the irregularity of the votes in two towns, in a district consisting of ten towns, in case the votes of those two towns do not amount to a majority of the whole number of votes in the district, such irregularity shall vitiate the election of such district?

Some observations were made by several gentlemen on the different modes of voting by ballot and en masse.

Mr. WATTS explained the process under the election law of New York, and stated the principles on which votes particularly circumstanced were rejected, and the accidents by which they were sometimes omitted in the general canvass.

The Committee, on the whole, did not appear to be ripe for a decision. They, therefore, rose and reported progress, and, after rejecting a motion that the Committee of Elections should be instructed to report a state of facts in their possession, (which several of the committee said they had already done,) the House adjourned, without coming to a vote on the report.

MONDAY, December 23.

ALEXANDER D. ORR, from Kentucky, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be approprinted for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resumed the reading of the communications from the Secretary of War, respecting the Southwestern frontiers, as connected with the Creeks and the State of Georgia, and the Southwestern Territory of the United States, and made a further progress therein.

TUESDAY, December 24.

The House resumed the consideration of the report from the Standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry K. Van Rensselaer, of the State of New York, complaining of an undue election and return of John E. Van Allen, to serve as a member of this House, for the said State. Whereupon,

The motion made on Friday last, to recommit the said report to the same committee, being revived, and the question put thereupon, it passed in the negative.

And then the said report being again read, as follows:

"That your committee have received from Lewis A. Scott, Secretary of the State of New York, a list of the number of votes given in each town in the counties of Rensselaer and Clinton, for John E. Van Allen and Henry K. Van Rensselaer, which list has been admitted by the said sitting member and petitioner to be a true and correct state of the ballots, estimated and canvassed at the said election.

"It appears to your committee, that the allegations in regard to Stephentown, viz.: That the petitioner had a greater number in the said town than was returned to be estimated and canvassed, even if proved, would not, consistently with the law of the State of New York, be sufficient to set aside the votes given at the election in the said town.

"That even should the irregularities complained of, with respect to the elections of the towns of Hoosack and Rensselaerwyck, be sufficient to set aside the votes given in the said towns, still it appears that the said John E. Van Allen has a majority of the remaining votes of the district, composed of the counties of Rensselaer and Clinton."

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said report.

Resolved, That the allegations of the petition do not state corruption, nor irregularities of sufficient magnitude, under the law of New York, to invalidate the election and return of John E. Van Allen to serve as a member in this House, and that, therefore, the said John E. Van Allen is duly elected.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Since the communications which were made to you on the affairs of the United States with Spain, and on the truce between Portugal and Algiers, some other papers have been received, which, making a part of the same subjects, are now communicated for your information.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 23, 1793.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom are committed the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and establishment of peace with the Algerines.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and establishment of peace with the Algerines; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and asked leave to sit again.

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before this House the substance of all such laws, decrees, or ordinances, respecting commerce, in any of the Kingdoms or Countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, and which have been received by the Secretary of State, and not already stated to this House, in his report of the sixteenth instant.

Ordered, That Mr. WINGATE, Mr. NEW, and Mr. ARMSTRONG, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, with the foregoing resolution.

THURSDAY, December 26.

A petition of Abram Trigg, of the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, complaining of an undue election and return of Francis Preston, to serve as a member of this House for the said State.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Elections; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and establishment of peace with the Algerines; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 27.

DANIEL HEISTER, from Pennsylvania, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LEE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions; which was read the first time.

TREATY WITH MOROCCO.

A motion being made for going into a Committee of the Whole on the subject which was under consideration yesterday—

Mr. NICHOLAS observed, that he hoped the business would be kept up without shutting the galleries; for the turn which the discussion took yesterday, he said, it must appear to every member, that excluding the citizens from the gallery was unnecessary.

Mr. BOURDINOT was of opinion, that the public business on the present occasion might be essentially injured by a public discussion.

The rule of the House relative to the discussion of confidential communications was called for, and read. This rule provides that the House shall be cleared of all persons but the members and clerk on such occasions.

Several members spoke in terms of great disapprobation of this rule.

Mr. BOURDINOT observed, that the rule had been adopted after mature consideration, and he did not doubt that, when the reasons on which it was founded were fully known, it would appear to be a wise regulation.

The question recurring for going into a Committee,

Mr. MADISON said if the House voted to go into Committee of the Whole, he supposed it would be moved in the first place, to rescind the above rule. He then stated sundry objections to it; he differed from Mr. BOURDINOT, as to its origin; he said it was passed on a particular occasion, and stated sundry circumstances of that occasion; he concluded by moving for a reconsideration of the rule.

The debate was continued on the subject of the rule; in the course of which it was said, that secrecy in a Republican Government wounds the majesty of the sovereign people; that this Government is in the hands of the people; and that they have a right to know all the transactions relative to their own affairs; this right ought not to be infringed incautiously, for such secrecy tends to injure the confidence of the people in their own Government.

In reply to these remarks, it was said, that because this Government is Republican, it will not be pretended that it can have no secrets. The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is the depository of secret transactions; his duty may lead him to delegate those secrets to the members of the House, and the success, safety, and energy of the Government may depend on keeping those secrets governed; they have interests as well as rights; and it is the duty of the Legislature to take every inviolably. The people have a right to be well informed; they have interests as well as rights; and it is the duty of the Legislature to take every possible measure to promote those interests. To discuss the secret transactions of the Government publicly, was the ready way to sacrifice the public interest, and to deprive the government of all foreign information, &c.

The motion for going into a Committee of the Whole on the Algerine business being put, was carried; and the galleries were thereupon cleared.

MONDAY, December 30.

Mr. NICHOLAS moved for a reconsideration of the rule of the House, which provides for closing the galleries during the discussion of confidential communications from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Some debate ensued on this motion. It was urged, in its support, that the rule bore oppressively on the House; that it left no option with them to determine whether it was proper to close the doors on a particular occasion, or not. Every communication denominated "confidential" imposed a necessity on the House for closing the doors. It had been said that the Committee on the Rules might report an alteration in this particular rule. In answer to this, it was urged that the committee might not be ready to report for some time; in the interim, that no necessity existed for the House having their deliberations hampered by this rule, which might be rescinded by a vote of the House. With respect to foreign connections, it was observed, these are of a commercial nature, and, therefore, communications relative thereto ought to be made as public as possible, for the people at large are generally and immediately concerned. Against the motion, it was said, no inconvenience had resulted from the operation of the rule; that, until the House experienced such an inconvenience, to repeal a rule on the spur of a particular occasion, which, in the nature of things, it is evidently founded on propriety, betrays a versatility in the public councils that may be productive of pernicious consequences. The utility of the rule was expatiated on, in a reference to various objects of a secret and confidential nature. It was observed, that so far as respects the United States, independent of all connexion with other countries, the rule was nugatory; but when it is considered that the United States are one of the nations of the earth, and have very important interests to consult in relation to their connexion with foreign countries, it follows, of course, that very important secrets may exist, and the Government may be deprived of the most essential information from their foreign agents, should all security be removed for the safe-keeping of confidential communications. It was observed, that the connexion of this country with foreign nations, involved other considerations than those of a commercial nature. The motion, after some further remarks, was varied so as to amount to an amendment only of the rule. The purport of this amendment is, that the rule should leave the House at liberty to discuss confidential communications publicly, if they see proper, after they have been privately read. The amendment was agreed to, in the following words:

"Resolved, That it be a standing order of this House, that, whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and (unless otherwise directed by the House) during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon; and that when the Speaker, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared, till the communication be made; the House shall then determine whether, when confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons except the members and the Clerk, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and (unless otherwise directed by the House) during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon; and that when the Speaker, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared, till the communication be made; the House shall then determine whether, ther the matter communicated requires secrecy, or not, and take order accordingly."

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House to whom were referred the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the transactions of the Government of the United States with Spain, be discharged from further proceeding on the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, December 31.

A petition of the Chief Clerks in several of the Executive Departments of the Government of the United States, was presented to the House and read, stating the insufficiency of the salaries allowed them by law, and praying that the same may be increased, and rendered more adequate to their services. Laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an alteration in the Flag of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The said bill was read twice and committed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit you a Report, by the Secretary of State, of such laws, decrees, and ordinances, or their substance, respecting commerce in the countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as he has received, and had not stated in his Report of the 16th instant.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1793.

The said Message and Report were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a Letter from the Secretary of State, informing me of certain impediments which have arisen to the coining of the precious metals at the Mint.

As also, a Letter from the same officer, relative to certain advances of money, which have been made on public account. Should you think proper to sanction what has been done, or be of opinion that anything more shall be done in the same way, you will judge whether there are not circumstances which would render secrecy expedient.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 30, 1793.

The said Message and Letters being read,

Ordered, That so much thereof as relates to the impediments which have arisen to the coining of the precious metals at the Mint be referred to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, and Mr. NILES; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That such other parts of the said Message and Letters, as relate to certain advances of money, which have been made on public account, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

WEDNESDAY, January 1, 1794.

URIAH FORREST and THOMAS SPENCE, from Maryland, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

Ordered, That the Message received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, accompanying a Report from the Secretary of State, of the substance of such laws, decrees, and ordinances, respecting commerce in the countries with which the United States have commercial intercourse, as he has received since his Report of the 16th instant, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom are committed the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and establishment of peace with the Algerines.

A memorial of William Patterson, Samuel Sterrit, and Gustavus Scott, the committee appointed by the Legislature of Maryland to draw for, and distribute the moneys granted by that State for the relief of the French emigrants from the island of St. Domingo, was presented to the House and read, stating that their funds are nearly exhausted, and praying the relief and aid of Congress in the premises.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. RUTHERFORD, and Mr. SMITH; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and the establishment of peace with the Algerines; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 2.

ISAAC COLES, from Virginia, and WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, from North Carolina, appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

duced their credentials, and took their seats in the House.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House on the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, and establishment of peace with the Algerines. Whereupon, the first and second of the said resolutions being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding — dollars be appropriated, in addition to the provision heretofore made, to defray any expense which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

Resolved, That a naval force, adequate to the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine corsairs, ought to be provided.

The third resolution being read in the words following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report to this House the naval force necessary for the purposes aforesaid, together with an estimate of the expense—

A motion was made and seconded to amend the same, by adding to the end thereof, the words "and the ways and means for defraying the same."

And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 46, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodoras Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Abraham Clark, Isaac Coles, William J. "Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report to this House the naval force necessary for the purposes aforesaid, together with an estimate of the expense, and the ways and means for defraying the same."

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODRUE, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. FORREST, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BOUNDNOT, Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACON, and Mr. WINN, be appointed a committee pursuant to the last resolution.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 3.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. MADISON, after some general observations on the Report, entered into a more particular consideration of the subject. He remarked, that the commerce of the United States is not, at this day, on that respectable footing to which, from its nature and importance, it is entitled. He recurred to its situation previous to the adoption of the Constitution, when conflicting systems prevailed in the different States. The then existing state of things gave rise to that Convention of Delegates from the different parts of the Union, who met to deliberate on some general principles for the regulation of commerce, which might be conducive, in their operation to the general welfare, and that such measures would be adopted as would conciliate the friendship and good faith of those countries who were disposed to enter into the nearest commercial connexions with us. But what has been the result of the system which has been pursued ever since? What is the present situation of our commerce? From the situation in which we find ourselves after four years' experiment, he observed, that it appeared incumbent on the United States to see whether they could not now take measures promotive of those objects for which the Government was in a great degree instituted. Measures of moderation, firmness, and decision, he was persuaded, were now necessary to be adopted, in order to narrow the sphere of our commerce with those nations who see proper not to meet us on terms of reciprocity.

Mr. M. then read the following Resolutions:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That the interest of the United States would be promoted by further restrictions and higher duties, in certain cases, on the manufactures and navigation of foreign nations employed in the commerce of the United States, than those now imposed.

"1. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That an additional duty ought to be laid on the following articles, manufactured by European nations having no commercial treaty with the United States: On all articles of which leather is the material of chief value, an additional duty of — per centum ad valorem; on all manufactured iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or articles of which either of these metals is the mate-should also obtain an equitable share in carrying our own produce; we should enter into the field of competition on equal terms, and enjoy the actual benefit of advantages which nature and the spirit of our people entitle us to.

He adverted to the advantageous situation this country is entitled to stand in, considering the nature of our exports and returns. Our exports are bulky, and therefore must employ much shipping, which might be nearly all our own: our exports are chiefly necessities of life, or raw materials, the food for the manufacturers of other nations. On the contrary, the chief of what we receive from other countries, we can either do without, or produce substitutes.

It is in the power of the United States, he conceived, by exerting her natural rights, without violating the rights, or even the equitable pretensions of other nations—by doing no more than most nations do for the protection of their interests, and much less than some, to make her interests respected; for, what we receive from other nations are but luxuries to us, which, if we choose to throw aside, we could deprive part of the manufacturers of those luxuries, of even bread, if we are forced, to the contest of self-denial. This being the case, our country may make her enemies feel the extent of her power. We stand, with respect to the nation exporting those luxuries, in the relation of an opulent individual to the laborer, in producing the superfluities for his accommodation; the former can do without those luxuries, the consumption of which gives bread to the latter.

He did not propose or wish that the United States should, at present, go so far in the line which his resolutions point to, as they might go. The extent to which the principles involved in those resolutions should be carried, will depend upon filling up the blanks. To go to the very extent of the principle immediately, might be inconvenient. He wished, only, that the Legislature should mark out the ground on which we think we can stand; perhaps it may produce the effect wished for, without unnecessary irritation; we need not at first go every length.

Another consideration would induce him, he said, to be moderate in filling up the blanks—not to wound public credit. He did not wish to risk any sensible diminution of the public revenue. He believed that if the blanks were filled with judgment, the diminution of the revenue, from a diminution in the quantity of imports, would be counterbalanced by the increase in the duties.

The last resolution he had proposed, he said, is, in a manner distinct from the rest. The nation is bound by the most sacred obligation, he conceived, to protect the rights of its citizens against a violation of them from any quarter; or, if they cannot protect, they are bound to repay the damage.

It is a fact authenticated to this House by communications from the Executive, that there are regulations established by some European nations, contrary to the Law of Nations, by which our property is seized and disposed of in such a way that damages have accrued. We are bound either to obtain reparation for the injustice, or compensate the damage. It is only in the first instance, no doubt, that the burden is to be thrown upon the United States. The proper Department of Government will, no doubt, take proper steps to obtain redress. The justice of foreign nations will certainly not permit them to deny reparation when the breach of the Law of Nations appear evidently; at any rate, it is just that the individual should not suffer. He believed the amount of the damages that would come within the meaning of this resolution would not be very considerable.

Mr. M.'s resolutions being seconded, were presented and read by the Clerk.

Mr. W. SMITH rose to make some remarks on the observations of Mr. MADISON, when a motion was made by Mr. FITZSIMONS, that the Committee should rise, and report progress, and that the House should give order for printing the resolutions.

After some further remarks by two or three members, Mr. MADISON said he had no wish to precipitate the discussion; he was content that the Committee should now rise, and that a future early day should be assigned.

The motion for the Committee's rising being put, was agreed to. The Committee rose accordingly, and reported progress.

A question then occurred as to the day on which the business should be taken into consideration. Next Monday was mentioned.

Mr. AWES proposed next Monday week. He observed that the resolutions involved the greatest interests of this country; that, for himself, he could not possibly be prepared to discuss the subject by Monday next. The Report of the Secretary was incomplete; a supplementary Report had been received from that officer, which had not yet been printed, and he believed that the members were not possessed of a knowledge of its contents; he could speak for himself at least. He further remarked, that the subject required the most mature deliberation of the House. Sudden and hasty decisions might be followed with the most serious effects; they might involve the sacrifice of the essential interests, or the honor of the United States.

Mr. MADISON said, he saw no necessity for a very distant day; the subject was not a new one; it existed previously to the present Government; it had been repeatedly before the Legislature of the United States; it had been amply dilated on in reports and public dissertations; he did not conceive there was a single proposition contained in the resolutions which had not been repeatedly revolved in the minds of every member of the House. He supposed an early discussion would be the most eligible, as the members would, as it proceeded, naturally throw light upon it.

Mr. W. SMITH was in favor of Monday week. He supposed that many documents would be wanted by the members which were not now in the possession of the House. Besides, he observed that, as soon as the present question was got rid of, he should lay before the House sundry resolutions respecting foreign tonnage, which would naturally connect themselves with the resolutions brought forward by the member from Virginia.

Mr. NICHOLAS was in favor of Wednesday. He wished for an early discussion. He thought the subject would receive more light from the public deliberations of the members themselves, than it would derive from their studies in their chambers; the discussion will be interesting; it cannot be hurried, and no sudden decision need be anticipated from as early a day as Wednesday.

Mr. MURRAY was in favor of Monday week. He differed from the gentleman last up, that a public collision on this or any other subject, was the most probable way to strike out the truth. The calm and dispassionate consideration of propositions at leisure, appeared to him more likely to be succeeded by a just and sound decision. He wished for more time than some gentlemen appeared willing to allow.

Mr. S. SMITH was in favor of Monday week. He enumerated a number of documents which he thought would be found necessary to enable the members to judge with precision. He considered the subject as highly important to his constituents, on which too much deliberation could scarcely be bestowed. It refers to taxes and new impositions on trade, the expediency of which ought to be maturely considered. The object of the propositions are evidently a commercial warfare; this is commonly introductory of another species of contest—a very serious consideration. The gentleman who brought forward the resolutions, had probably matured his ideas on the subject. For his part, he had not; he required more time.

The motion for Monday week being put, was carried by a large majority.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House a comparative view of the tonnage employed in the trade between the United States and foreign countries, for the years 1790, 1791, and 1792; also that he report the actual tonnage of vessels of the United States, employed in one year, between the United States and foreign countries.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY January 6.

JAMES GILLESPIE, from North Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

PAY OF SOLDIERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States. The bill being read,

On the clause of the bill for augmenting the pay of the soldiers from three to four dollars per month, Mr. IRVINE proposed an addition of a fifth dollar, and children of such soldiers as should happen to lose their lives in the service.

Mr. BOURNOR said, that he should be very sorry to recommend the augmentation, if he thought that it would induce farmers, and sober, industrious people to quit their families and professions, in exchange for a military life. This, he thought, would indeed be a very alarming consequence, and, did he apprehend it, he should undoubtedly oppose the intended increase. He had no apprehensions of that kind. America would be in a very bad situation, indeed, if an additional pay of twelve dollars a year could bribe a farmer or manufacturer to enlist. He should look very strange at any of his neighbors who should tell him that they had embraced such an offer. Instead of augmenting the pay, perhaps it was better to add something to the rations; those, for example, of salt and flour. He thought it safest to agree to the four dollars, because if they voted for five, the bill would probably be thrown out of the other House; and thus, by grasping at too much, the move of the amendment would lose the bill altogether. Originally, troops had been raised for less than two dollars per month. The pay had since been augmented to three, and was now on the way of being raised to four. He wished to make its advances gradual. If we looked at the situations of other countries, and contemplated the state of their finances, we should be convinced that America paid her troops as well in proportion to her ability as any other people in the world, and that her soldiers had no right to complain.

Mr. MONTGOMERY spoke a few words in favor of an advance to five dollars.

Mr. SCOTT said, that Pennsylvania had some time ago raised a few companies of soldiers for her frontier service, and given them two pounds ten shillings currency per month, which was equal to six dollars and two-thirds. In consequence of this, the companies had been filled with some of the most respectable kind of people in the country. They were quite of a different class from the recruits raised for the Western Army. He wished to try the five dollars. This superior pay was reported to have hurt the Continental recruiting service. He thought it very possible that such had been the case. If Government give the proposed five dollars, the Continental Army might, perhaps, get all the levies which it wanted from these very companies.

Mr. HUNTER would have voted for six dollars. Mr. BEATTY said, that he was for giving five dollars, from a conviction that it was requisite for the service.

Mr. SMITH was decidedly for the additional augmentation. The recruits, he said, who had been raised in this city were sad fellows, and not fit to be trusted. Better pay would bring forward better men.

Mr. SMITH said that, as to the rate of labor, good men were hired to work in Vermont for eighteen pounds a year, which is equal to four dollars per month, and out of that they find their own clothes. He thought it a very dangerous plan to raise the wages of soldiers at this time, when every article was above its natural price; because, when things return to their old level, it would be impossible to reduce their wages. The people of Europe had, by their wars, increased the demand for the produce of our farms, and this had raised the wages of labor. The members of Congress had six dollars per day, and it would be no easy matter to alter that, which he seemed to hint might not be quite improper. He thought that high pay would only serve to make the soldiers get drunk. It would be much better to give them some substantial gratification at the end of the service.

3d Con.—6

Pay of Soldiers.

Mr. WADSWORTH said that the Army, in getting four dollars, got plenty, and he despaired of seeing five dollars pass through that House; but, were they to vote twenty dollars, they never would be able to enlist that class of men whom it was expected five dollars would collect. A member had mentioned, as a proof of the possibility of enlisting the sons of farmers, the instance of a party in one of the New England States, who had formed themselves into a military body, and had gone westward in quest of a settlement, but were cut to pieces by the Indians. He knew this, and he had likewise heard of others who had since gone from the same quarter, and upon the same errand. He had inquired about their characters, and had found, just as he had expected, that they were very honest, good sort of people, but somewhat of a rambling disposition, and not remarkably industrious. As to the notion of enlisting men, and attaching them to their country, by five dollars a month, it would not do. The old Continental Army were very good soldiers, but certainly some of them did not fight for the sake of their country, since they deserted by scores. They were, however, brought back, and fought very well. Their reasons for deserting, he did not pretend to know; but this he knew, that they were very idle and very worthless fellows, which did not hinder them from doing their duty. Mr. W. added, that it was a mistake to propose giving five dollars a month for fear that we should not be able to get recruits. In a short time our communication by sea would be cut off. We would likewise be prevented from emigrations into the back country. Recruits would then be had in the greatest abundance for four dollars a month, as great numbers of people would then be thrown out of employment, and enlist for want of it.

The amendment to the bill, of adding two dollars instead of one, was rejected.

Mr. CLARK then moved, as an amendment of the bill, that there should be an addition of four ounces of bread or flour, and four ounces of meat to each ration.

Mr. HARTLEY was for augmenting the rations. He knew that they were too small. In cultivated countries they might do, but not in the back woods, where vegetables were not to be had.

Mr. WADSWORTH was convinced that the rations were sufficient, unless on a march. He spoke, he said, from experience.

Mr. GILES had been frequently informed by officers in the Army, that the rations were all defective. In the back woods, the soldiers had been often reduced to such distress for want of vegetables, as to go in search of acorns to supply their place.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that he had been informed that the principal objection to the rations was the inferior quality of the meat, and that this arose from the leanness of the cattle, as being exhausted by hard driving. Instead, therefore, of a regular increase, it might perhaps be better to provide for accidental contingencies.

Mr. MURRAY moved, and his motion was seconded, to amend the amendment by striking out the words, and "four ounces of meat."

Mr. SMITH said, that an aide-de-camp, who was his relation, and now serving in the Army, had wrote him that they were just now well fed, well clothed, in good health, and as good spirits as an Army had ever enjoyed. The reason of the common rations of provisions failing in a march, was owing to the waste in cooking. The amendment of Mr. CLARK, and the additional amendment of Mr. MURRAY, were both withdrawn.

The Committee now rose and reported the amendment, and the bill and amendment were ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what alteration ought to be made in the ration now allowed to the troops of the United States; and that Mr. IRVINE, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. HEISTER, be the said committee.

TUESDAY, January 7.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you an official statement of the expenditure to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, from the sum of ten thousand dollars, granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by an act passed on the twenty-sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 7, 1794.

The said Message and statement were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Another Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate

and of the House of Representatives:

Experience has shown that it would be useful to have an officer particularly charged under the direction of the Department of War, with the duties of receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing the public supplies, in all cases in which the laws and the course of service do not devolve them upon other officers; and also, with that of superintending, in all cases, the issues in detail of supplies, with power for that purpose to bring to account all persons intrusted to make such issues in relation thereto. An establishment of this nature, by securing a regular and punctual accountability for the issues of public supplies, would be a great guard against abuse, would tend to insure their due application, and to give public satisfaction on that point.

I therefore recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an establishment of this nature, under such regulations as shall appear to them advisable.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 7, 1794.

The said Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That it be an instruction to the committee appointed on Thursday last, on the subject of the Algerine communications, that they prepare and report to the House an estimate of the expense that will be requisite to place the principal seaports and harbors of the United States in a state of defence.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, which was made on the twenty-third ultimo, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the committee appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making an alteration in the Flag of the United States."

Mr. GOODHUE thought it a trifling business, which ought not to engross the attention of the House, when it was their duty to discuss matters of infinitely greater consequence. If we are to alter the Flag from thirteen to fifteen stripes, with two additional stars, because Vermont and Kentucky have been added, we may go on adding and altering at this rate for one hundred years to come. It is very likely, before fifteen years elapse, we shall consist of twenty States. The Flag ought to be permanent.

Mr. LYMAN was of a different opinion. He thought it of the greatest consequence not to offend the new States.

Mr. THATCHER ridiculed the idea of being at so much trouble, as a consummate specimen of frivolity. At this rate, every State should alter its public seal when an additional county or township was formed. He was sorry to see the House take up their time with such trifles.

Mr. GREENUP considered it of very great consequence to inform the rest of the world that we had now two additional States.

Mr. NILES was very sorry that such a matter should even for a moment have hindered the House from going into more important affairs. He did not think the alteration either worth the trouble of adopting or rejecting; but he supposed that the shortest way to get rid of it was to agree to it, and for that reason, and no other, he advised to pass it as soon as possible.

The Committee agreed to it, and the Chairman reported the bill. The House then took it up.

JANUARY, 1794.]

Proceedings.

[H. or R.]

Mr. BONDINOT thought it of consequence to keep the citizens of Vermont and Kentucky in good humor. They might be affronted at our rejecting the bill.

Mr. GOODHUE said, he felt for the honor of the House, when spending their time on such sort of business. But, since it must be passed, he had only to beg this favor, that it might not appear upon the journals, and go into the world as the first of the bills passed this session.

Mr. MADISON was for the bill passing.

Mr. GILES thought it very proper that the idea should be preserved of the number of our States, and the number of stripes corresponding. The expense was but trifling, compared with that of forming the Government of a new State.

Mr. SMITH said, that this alteration would cost him five hundred dollars, and every vessel in the Union sixty. He could not conceive what the Senate meant by sending them such bills. He supposed that it must be for want of something better to do. He should indulge them, but let us have no more alterations of this sort. Let the Flag be permanent.

It was ordered that the bill be read a third time to-morrow.

A motion was then made for publishing the resolutions of the House concerning the Algerine business.

Mr. WADSWORTH recommended publicity. He said that their talking so much about secrecy made the world believe they really had a secret, when in fact they had none. It reminded him of a story in the last war. They intended a secret expedition into Canada; but unluckily they let a clergyman into the story, and he next Sunday offered up his prayers from the pulpit for its success, which put an end to it. The House agreed to the publication of the resolutions.

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy imposed by the House, so far as relates to the resolutions agreed to on Thursday last, on the subject of the confidential communications from the PRESIDENT, respecting the measures which have been pursued for obtaining a recognition of the Treaty between the United States and Morocco, and for the ransom of prisoners, be removed, and that the said resolutions be published.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to select such parts of the PRESIDENT'S Communications, respecting the Regency of Algiers, as his Letter, accompanying said Communications, suggests it would be proper to keep secret, and that they report the same to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for regulating Pilots in the bay and river Delaware, and for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, be the said committee.

WEDNESDAY, January 8.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making an alteration in the Flag of the United States," was read the third time.

Mr. B. BONDINOT moved that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. WATTS seconded the motion. He said his object was, to have a clause added to establish the Flag of the United States, so that in case of new accessions to the Union, future applications for alterations may be precluded; he added, that he supposed the title of the bill should be amended, he proposed take place, ought to be a bill to establish the Flag of the United States.

The motion for a reference to a select committee being put, was negatived—49 to 89.

Mr. W. then moved that the bill should be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of introducing a clause to fix, for ever, the Flag of the United States. This motion was lost.

And, on the question that the bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS.—James Armstrong, Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, William J. Mr. IRVINE, from the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, alteration ought to be made in the ration now allowed to the troops of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Military Establishment—Estimates of Appropriations.

[JANUARY, 1794.]

THURSDAY, January 9.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

It was then moved, that the House proceed to consider the bill for the better support of the Military Establishment of the United States. Agreed to.

The Clerk then read an amendment agreed to by the Committee of the Whole House, as to granting ——— years of half-pay to the widows and orphans of such soldiers as die in the service of the United States.

Mr. BEATTY then moved a second amendment, which was, in substance, that an addition to the pay at present given to the non-commissioned officers and soldiers, that, for those hereafter enlisted, a certain sum per month shall be allowed, and reserved, and be given to him at the time of his discharge; and if he dies, before the end of his service, the money shall be paid to his representatives. Mr. B. also wished this gratuity to be unalienable, that a non-commissioned officer or soldier might not be tempted to dispose of it beforehand, for less than its value, and thereby disappoint the benevolent design of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH proposed to add, as an amendment, the word officers, before the words “non-commissioned officers and soldiers.” He said, that the officers were more depressed than the soldiers, which was known to the whole country.

Mr. SMITH could not consent to this amendment, without better information than any which he yet had.

Mr. SCOTT said, that he could not believe that the officers of the Army were in a state of depression. He, at this time, could mention forty applications for military commissions. There were great numbers of country gentlemen who would be glad to get them. It was the private men who wanted encouragement.

Mr. SMITH thought that the amendment of Mr. WADSWORTH, upon the amendment of Mr. BEATTY, came in awkwardly in this place. He was friendly to the general idea, but disliked the mode.

Mr. BOUNDNOT moved to strike out the words hereafter enlisted, and to apply the bounty to every non-commissioned officer and soldier, in the service. There was no good reason for such a material distinction between the old soldiers and the new levies. The amendment would then meet his wishes.

Mr. WADSWORTH withdrew his amendment upon the amendment, and the original amendment of Mr. WATTS, with the bill, was referred to a select committee.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be re-committed to Messrs. BEATTY, IRVINE, JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, DEARBORN, and VAN GAASEBECK.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions: whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be re-committed to Messrs. GILES, DEXTER, SHEAR-JAHUB BOURNE, LEE, and CLARK.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary, of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That this House will, to-morrow, again resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said report.

FRIDAY, January 10.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the statements and estimates of appropriations for the current year, 1794.

Mr. GILES suggested several reasons for separating the items and the estimate of appropriations for the Civil List, and for discharging the current expenses of Government, from the articles designated for other purposes. He moved the House to take up the resolution agreed to by the Whole House yesterday, and make it the subject of a separate bill.

Mr. MADISON said, that members had been reduced to the most serious difficulties by the delays in the payment of their salaries. The Civil List ought always to have a fund provided for it in the first place, because it was a mere matter of form to put it to a vote. It was otherwise with the Military Establishment. He trusted that would never be reduced to a mere form.

Mr. NICHOLAS supported the motion of Mr. GILES. He thought that the House should immediately pass a bill for establishing a provision for the expenses of the members of Congress. It was not fair to suppose that every gentleman in that House came to town with as much money in his pocket as would clear his expenses. Why put any person to pecuniary inconvenience when at a distance from his resources? The accounts ought to be kept distinct.

Mr. FITZSIMONS and Mr. BOURNE remarked, that the next article in the estimates was so blended with the preceding that they must be comprehended in one.

On this, Mr. NICHOLAS withdrew his second to the motion, and the House went into a Committee of the whole, Mr. TOWNSEND in the Chair.

Mr. BOUNDNOT moved a resolution covering the next article in the estimate. The item providing for the clerks in the Loan Office, being objected to, was passed over for the present.

Mr. GILES then moved, that the Committee do now rise. The motion was seconded by Mr. NICHOLAS, and supported by Mr. MADISON.

The resolution moved by Mr. BOUNDNOT, that $107,693 43, be appropriated for sundry purposes, was agreed to. The Committee then rose, and the House, after some consideration, adopted the resolutions.

French Emigrants from St. Domingo.

[H. or R.]

Mr. GILES then moved, that a committee should be appointed, to prepare and bring in a bill for that purpose. This was agreed to, and a committee named.

Resolved, That, for the expenditure of the Civil List of the United States, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments, and offices thereof, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:

[Here follows an enumeration of the different items.]

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the said report; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon, which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That, for making good deficiencies for the support of the Civil List Establishment; for aiding the Fund appropriated for certain officers of the Court, jurors, and witnesses; for the support of light-houses, and for other purposes, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:

[Here the items are enumerated.]

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and the resolution for the expenditure of the Civil List; and that Mr. BOUNDNOT, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. GILES, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee appointed to select such parts of the President's Communications, respecting the Regency of Algiers, as his Letter, accompanying the said Communications, suggests it would be proper to keep secret, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, respecting the appointment of an officer for receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing, the public supplies, under the direction of the War Department, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. BEATTY, and Mr. SWIFT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

FRENCH EMIGRANTS FROM ST. DOMINGO.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Patterson, Samuel Sterrett, and Gustavus Scott, the committee appointed by the Legislature of Maryland to draw and distribute the moneys granted by that State for the relief of the French emigrants from the Island of St. Domingo, made a report:

Mr. S. SMITH said, that there never was a more noble and prompt display of the most exalted feelings, than had been exhibited on this occasion. He believed that such a scene of distress had never before been seen in America. Three thousand fugitives had been at once landed, without the least previous expectation of their arrival. The whole inhabitants instantly assembled, and deputed a committee, of which he was one, to go on board the vessels, and examine their situation. Thirteen thousand dollars were instantly sub-quite helpless; three hundred and fifty of them were old men, or women without their husbands, or children without their parents. Some had credit, and some had not. Five hundred of them had been sent to France by the Minister, at the expense of the Republic; the rest remain in this country.

[It was then moved, that the report of the Relief Committee be read a second time; which being done, it was moved that this report be taken up by a Committee of the Whole House.]

Mr. S. SMITH was for proceeding instantly to decide on the subject.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped that the motion would be deferred to another day. He felt a difficulty in this matter, because it was entirely new to him; he had not yet formed his mind upon it. He suspected that, to bestow the money of their constituents on an act of charity, though it would be extremely laudable, was yet beyond their authority. They had been sent to this House with limited powers, and for special purposes. He would be extremely happy to vote for the relief of the fugitives of Cape Francois, if, upon reflection, he found it Constitutional. He therefore wished to delay a determination, until he had leisure to form a deliberate opinion on the subject.

Mr. CLARK never had entertained a moment's hesitation that relief should be given.

Mr. S. SMITH, to prove that there was no illegality in bestowing the assistance wanted, read a passage in the despatches that had been printed, addressed by our Executive Government to the American Minister at Paris, stating that they had thought themselves authorized to advance money, for the immediate support of the fugitives. From this proceeding, he inferred, that Congress might lawfully do the same. He mentioned the obligations that this country lay under to France, which he hoped would never be forgotten. He enlarged considerably on the generosity of the citizens of Baltimore. He imagined that, in this affair, the American nation had exerted a degree of generosity unparalleled in the history of any other people.

Mr. MADISON wished to relieve the sufferers, but was afraid of establishing a dangerous precedent, which might hereafter be perverted to the countenance of purposes very different from those of charity. He acknowledged, for his own part, that he could not undertake to lay his finger on that article in the Federal Constitution which granted a right to Congress of expending, on objects of benevolence, the money of their constituents. And if once they broke the line laid down before them, for the direction of their conduct, it was impossible to say to what lengths they might go, or to what extremities this practice might be carried. He did not agree with the member who spoke last, that nothing like the generosity of America had ever been heard of before. As one example in contradiction to this assertion, he mentioned, that when the city of Lisbon had, in 1755, been overwhelmed by an earthquake, the Parliament of England instantly voted one hundred thousand pounds for the support of the sufferers. In doing this, they had, he believed, acted in unison with the feelings of the British nation, and such feelings did that nation the utmost honor. He likewise imagined, that the Parliament had acted agreeably to the British Constitution, which allowed them an indefinite and absolute right in disposing of the money of their constituents. But as to the American Congress, the case was widely different. He was satisfied that the citizens of the United States possessed an equal degree of magnanimity, generosity, and benevolence, with the people of Britain, but this House certainly did not possess an undefined authority corresponding with that of a British Parliament. He wished that some other mode could be devised for assisting the French sufferers than by an act of Congress. He was in hopes that some other mode, equally effectual, and less exceptionable, might be devised. As to what our executive Government had already done, as quoted from the official despatches by the gentleman who spoke last, the inference did not apply; for in that emergency, a delay would have been equivalent to a total denial. It had been said, that we owed the French every sentiment of gratitude. It was true; but it was likewise true that we owed them something else than sentiments, for we were indebted to them a very large sum of money. One of the instalments of that debt would be due in a short time, and perhaps it might be safest for Congress to advance the sums now wanted for the French refugees, in part of that debt, and leave it to the decision of the French Ministry whether they would accept of such a payment or not. He did not wish to press this expedient upon the House, but he begged leave to submit it to their consideration; and as he had not yet been able to resolve in his own mind what line of conduct the House ought to pursue, he requested that the discussion of the question might for a short time be deferred.

Mr. CLARK wished that the gentleman who spoke last would be careful of preserving consistency. It was only a few days ago that he had laid before the House a resolution, by which Congress were to indemnify all such citizens of the United States as had suffered losses by the British pirates. He supposed that for this, there would be found as little authority in the articles of the Constitution, as for relieving the fugitives from Cape Francois.

Mr. MADISON, in explanation, replied, that the two cases were widely different. The vessels of America sailed under our flag, and were under our protection, by the law of Nations, which the French sufferers unquestionably were not. As to the resolution he had proposed, it was not then before the House, and hence he could not speak to it with propriety. It was very possible that the House might find it wrong, and reject it. He wished not to be misunderstood, for he was sure that every member in that House felt the warmest sympathy with the situation of the sufferers. He would be very glad to find a proper way for their relief.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that he had not been able to discover upon what authority the House were to grant the proposed donation. If the question should that day come to a vote, which he trusted it would not, he had resolved to give his voice in favor of the sufferers; but, when he returned to his constituents, he would honestly tell them that he considered himself as having exceeded his powers, and so cast himself on their mercy. He felt many obstacles to voting away this money without further deliberation.

Mr. BOUNDINOT declared, that he had never been able to discover any difficulty in the matter. By the law of Nature, by the law of Nations—in a word, by every moral obligation that could influence mankind, we were bound to relieve the citizens of a Republic who were at present our allies, and who had formerly been our benefactors. He could not for a moment endure the idea of a hesitation on such a question. When a number of our fellow-creatures had been cast upon our sympathy, in a situation of such unexampled wretchedness, was it possible that gentlemen could make a doubt whether it was our duty to relieve them? It had been said that the House was not, by the Constitution, authorized to give away money for such purposes. He was satisfied, that to refuse the assistance requested, would be to act in direct opposition both to the theory and practice of the Constitution. In the first place, as to the practice, it had been said that nothing of this kind had ever occurred before under the Federal Constitution. He was astonished at such an affirmation. Did not the Indians frequently come down to this city, on embassies respecting the regulating of trade, and other business—and did not the Executive, without consulting Congress at all, pay their lodgings for weeks, nay for whole months together? and was not this merely because the Indians were unable to pay for themselves? Nobody ever questioned the propriety of that act of charity. Again; when prisoners of war were taken, there was no clause in the Constitution authorizing Congress to provide for their subsistence: yet it was well known that they would not be suffered to starve. Provision was instantly made for them, before we could tell whether the nation to whom they belonged would pay such expenses, or would not pay them. It was very true that an instalment would soon be due to France, nor did he object to reimbursement in that way, if it could be so obtained. But, in the mean time, relief must be given, for he was convinced that we had still stronger obligations to support the citizens of our allies than either Indians or prisoners of war. In the second place, as to the theory of the Constitution, he referred gentlemen to the first clause of the eighth section of it. By that clause Congress were warranted to provide for exigencies regarding the general welfare, and he was sure this case came under that description.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS thought that it would be expedient to lose as little time as possible in going into the Committee. It was hard on the State of Maryland to support of itself such an immense number of people. Besides, the period for which that State had engaged to furnish them with subsistence was expiring; so that it was absolutely necessary to come to an early decision whether the House would assist them or not. Mr. GENET had made a discrimination among the sufferers: some of them he had promised to assist, and others, as aristocrats, he had disowned altogether.

Mr. DEXTER read the clause referred to by Mr. BOUNDINOT, but could not draw from it any such inference. He was very unwilling to vote against the proposition, and therefore solicited a delay, that he might have leisure to find proper reasons for voting in its favor.

Mr. GILES was averse to precipitation in an affair of such magnitude. The report had been read for a first time to-day; it had then been read for a second time to-day. As if all this had not been sufficient, the House must likewise go into a Committee this day. Like the gentleman who had just sat down, he felt many doubts as to the legality of such an act of bounty; and he wished, before he gave a vote on either side of the question, to free himself from these doubts. He considered his duty to his constituents as a very solemn trust. Some personal insinuations had been cast out, as if gentlemen who professed Constitutional scruples had wished to embarrass the subject. Reflections of this kind could answer no good purpose. Gentlemen (said Mr. G.) appeal to our humanity. The appeal is out of place. That is not the question; but whether, organized as we are, under the Constitution, we have a right to make such a grant? He did not understand why an application was made to Congress in particular. It would have been made with greater propriety to the Provincial Assemblies, as their power over the purses of their constituents was more extensive than that of this House over the revenues of the United States.

[The motion for the House resolving itself into a Committee immediately was then withdrawn, and the report was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.]

MONDAY, January 13.

PETITION OF THOMAS MANNING.

Mr. SHEERBURN called up the petition of Thomas Manning, presented last week. He observed that the facts set forth in the petition were established by documents which accompanied it. That the petition originated in a contract made by the petitioner with an agent of the French Government in Martinique; that, although that Government had recognised the powers of their agent, and the performance of the services which were the ground of the contract, they had refused to fulfil it, but by a payment of assignats, instead of specie, which had been particularly specified. He observed, had the contract been made with an individual, a process in a Judicial Court would have procured an indemnity, but it was with a nation, over which Judicial Courts had no control; the petitioner, therefore, could derive no redress but from the justice of his country, which was bound to protect the rights of its citizens in all cases, and when it could not prevent an injury, it ought to repair the damage. That this, in the present case, might be done with a moral assurance of a reimbursement, as it would be a just article of charge in the account of the United States against France, to which justice must cheerfully give its sanction, and which in happier times, that Government will undoubtedly allow. That, as the justice of the demand was confessed, indemnifying the petitioner would be advancing a payment for France, for which her credit and honor were pledged, but not at present allow her to make; but, Mr. S. observed, that as the case was of the first impression, and he wished there might be a thorough investigation of principles as well as facts, he moved that the petition, with the documents accompanying it, might be referred to the Secretary of State. This motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a statement of the actual tonnage of American vessels employed in the commerce between the United States and foreign countries, for one year, ending the thirtieth of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, pursuant to the order of this House, of the third instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States, in foreign countries. When

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman:—Among the various duties which are assigned by the Constitution to the Legislature of the United States, there is, perhaps, none of a more important nature than the regulation of commerce, none more generally interesting to our fellow-citizens, none which more seriously claims our diligent and accurate investigation.

It so essentially involves our navigating, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interest, that an apology for the prolixity of the observations which I am about to submit to the Committee, will scarcely be requisite.

In the view which I shall take of the question, disengaging the inquiry from all topics of a political nature, I shall strictly confine myself to those which are commercial, and which alone are, in my judgment, properly connected with the subject.

Called upon to decide on propositions, merely commercial, and springing from a report, in its nature limited to commercial regulations, it would be as ill-timed, as it would be irregular, to mingle with the discussion considerations of a political nature. I shall, accordingly, reject from the inquiry every idea which has reference to the Indians, the Algerines, or the Western posts. Whenever those subjects require our deliberations, I shall not yield to any member in readiness to vindicate the honor of our country, and to concur in such measures as our best interests may demand.

This line of procedure will, I trust, be deemed by those gentlemen who follow me, the only proper one, and that the debate will be altogether confined to commercial views; these will of themselves open a field of discussion sufficiently spacious, without the intervention of arguments derived from other sources. It would indeed argue a weakness of ground in the friends of the proposition, and imply a distrust of the merits of their cause, were they compelled to bolster it up with such auxiliaries and to resort for support to arguments, not resulting from the nature of the subject, but from irrelative and extraneous considerations.

The propositions, as well as the report, being predicated upon facts and principles having relation to our commerce and navigation with foreign countries, by those facts and principles, and those alone, ought the propositions stand or fall.

It will not be denied that this country is at present in a very delicate crisis, and one requiring dispassionate reflection, cool and mature deliberation. It will be much to be regretted then, if passion should usurp the place of reason, if superficial, narrow, and prejudiced views should mislead the public councils from the true path of national interest.

The report of the Secretary of State, on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries is now before the Committee. The tendency of that report (whatever may have been the design of the reporter) appears to be to induce a false estimate of the comparative condition of our commerce with certain foreign nations, and to urge the Legislature to adopt a scheme of retaliating regulations, restrictions, and exclusions.

The most striking contrast which the performance evidently aims at, is between Great Britain and France. For this reason, and as these are the two Powers with whom we have the most extensive relations in trade, I shall, by a particular investigation of the subject, endeavor to lay before the Committee an accurate and an impartial comparison of the commercial systems of the two countries in reference to the United States, as a test of the solidity of the inferences which are attempted to be established by the report. A fair comparison can only be made with an eye to what may be deemed the permanent system of the countries in question. The proper epoch for it, therefore, will precede the commencement of the pending French Revolution.

The commercial regulations of France during the period of the Revolution have been too fluctuating, too much influenced by momentary impulses, and, as far as they have looked towards this country with a favorable eye, too much manifesting an object of the moment, which cannot be mistaken to consider them as a part of a system. But though the comparison will be made with principal reference to the condition of our trade with France and Great Britain, antecedent to the existing revolution, the regulations of the subsequent period will perhaps not be passed over altogether unnoticed.

The table,* which I have before me, comprises the principal features of the subject within a short compass. It is the work of a gentleman of considerable commercial knowledge, and I believe may be relied on for its correctness. An attentive reference to it will, with some supplementary remarks, convey a just conception of the object, a view to conciseness and simplicity has excluded from it all articles (the production and manufactures of the United States) which are not of considerable importance.

Accustomed as our ears have been to a constant panegyric on the generous policy of France towards this country in commercial relations, and to us as constant a philippic on the unfriendly, illiberal, and persecuting policy of Great Britain towards us in the same relations, we naturally expect to find in a table which exhibits their respective systems, numerous discriminations in that of France in our favor, and many valuable privileges granted to us, which are refused to other foreign countries, in that of Great Britain frequent discriminations to our prejudice, and a variety of privileges refused to us which are granted to other foreign nations. But an inspection of the table will satisfy every candid mind, that the reverse of what has been supposed is truly the case—that neither in France nor the French West Indies, is there more than one solitary and important distinction in our favor, (I mean the article of fish oil,) either with regard to our exports thither, our imports from thence, or our shipping; that both in Great Britain and the British West Indies, there are several material distinctions in our favor, with regard both to our exports thither and to our imports from thence, and, as it respects Great Britain, with regard also to our shipping; that in the market of Great Britain, a preference is secured to six of our most valuable staples, by considerable higher duties on the rival articles of other foreign countries; that our navigation thither is favored by our ships, when carrying our own productions, being put upon as good a footing as their own ships, and by the exemption of several of our productions, when carried in our ships, from duties which are paid on the like articles of other foreign countries carried in the ships of those countries; and that several of our productions may be carried from the United States to the British West Indies, while the like productions cannot be carried thither from any other foreign country; and that several of the productions of those countries may be brought from thence to the United States, which cannot be carried from thence to any other foreign country.

These important differences in the systems of the two countries will appear more fully, by passing—ing in review each article, and presenting, at the same time, the remarks which it will suggest.

EXPORTS.

1. Flour.—This article, on its importation into France, was subject to a duty of one-eighth per cent ad valorem. Since the commencement of the Revolution it has been, with all other foreign flour, made free. Here is no distinction for or against us.

In Great Britain, it was, and is, like other foreign flour, subject to a duty so high as in ordinary times to be prohibitory; this duty is 24s. 3d. per quarter, until the price of British flour rises as high as fifty shillings, when a duty of sixpence only is payable.

It enjoys the right of deposit, with the privilege of exporting, duty free, and with the option of waiting till the market prices give effect to the low duties. There is no distinction for or against us. The same system applies generally to grain.

The ordinary state of things renders the result of both systems the same to us. In neither country is our flour saleable with advantage but in times of particular scarcity; in Great Britain, because the duty prevents an advantageous competition, except in such times; in France, because the capacity of that country to supply herself is such, that we cannot, in common cases, afford to sell our flour in her market. The average price of flour in France, in times of tranquility and common plenty, may be stated at five dollars and two-thirds of a dollar per barrel of Pennsylvania. This, computing the price at which flour has been for a number of years past in Pennsylvania, would not pay freight and charges, taking the average here, at four dollars and two-thirds (the charges, including freight and insurance, being about one dollar and two-thirds) the price, to pay freight, ought not to be less than six dollars and a third.

The conclusion is, that neither France nor Great Britain is to be considered as a valuable market for the flour of the United States.

If an authority, respectable on that point, I mean the report of a committee of the British Privy Council, may be trusted (which declares an increasing incompetency for self supply on the part of Great Britain) the chance even is, that Great Britain may prove the better customer of the two for this article, notwithstanding her high duties. That nation discourages the competition of foreign flour with her own in her own market, because she has reason to fear that such competition may supplant her own and injure her agriculture. France does not discourage the competition, because experience has shown her that it cannot turn to her disadvantage; so the United States lay but a trifling duty on the same article, because we know that it cannot come into competition with our own.

In the French West Indies, the introduction of flour from the United States and other foreign countries was prohibited by a standing law. There was no distinction for or against us. The Colonial Government, it is true, had power to make occasional suspensions with a view to seasons of scarcity, and they have from time to time exercised that power. But the Secretary of State is mistaken, when he says that the general prohibition has been latterly suspended without interruption; unless he refers to a period later than that which he mentions as the point of time to which his report is limited, (namely, the Summer of 1792,) a period in which all systems have been suspended.

There was indeed an arrêt of the Colonial Government of St. Domingo, of May 9th, 1789, which established a partial suspension till August, 1794; but this suspension was confined to a particular and small part of the island, on very special reasons, with cautious guards to intercept its effect with other parts of the island; and it is supposed that even this arrêt was revoked in France.

The real system of France then in regard to this article, and with respect to its West India Colonies, was completely prohibitory.

In the British West Indies, on the contrary, flour from the United States was, and is a free article, and with this distinction in our favor, that the flour of any other foreign country cannot be carried thither from such country even in British bottoms.

The comparison therefore between the systems of France and Great Britain, in relation to this article, concludes clearly in favor of Great Britain. In Europe, their systems, though different, from difference of circumstances, terminate nearly in the same point. In the West Indies, the steady, certain, and therefore, the truly important market for us, the system of France aims at the total exclusion of our principal staple; that of Great Britain gives it a free admission, and even a preference.

Authentic statements of the exports of flour from Philadelphia in the years 1786 and 1788 (which I accidentally possess) serve to illustrate the natural operation of the two systems, being applicable to years in which no extraordinary causes changed the common course of the trade.

By these statements it appears that in 1786, the exports were—

	Barrels.
To France	21
To the French West Indies	1,808
Total	1,829
To Great Britain	0
To the British West Indies	45,118
Total	45,118
In 1788, the exports were—
To France	2,375
To the French West Indies	285
Total	2,660

In these years the shipments from the same port to other British ports amounted to 6,358 barrels. The last three or four years present, indeed, a different state of things, as will be shown hereafter. But these having been years of revolution and convulsion, are not such good criteria as those which have been just noticed.

2. Tobacco.—This article was under no duty in France; but it was subject to a monopoly of the Farmers General, a circumstance which was a serious impediment to our trade with France in this article, obstructing the enterprise and competition of our own merchants in the markets of that country. There is no distinction for or against the United States.

In Great Britain it was and is subject to a duty of 1s. 3d. per pound on importation, other foreign tobacco paying 3s. 6d. per pound.*

The Secretary of State has omitted to notice this difference. Our tobacco then stood, and it may be added, still stands upon a better footing in Great Britain than in France.

Here I request the attention of the committee to a principle of importance, which appears to have been overlooked by the Secretary of State, who indiscriminately presents, as a discouragement of our produce, all the internal duties which are laid upon it by foreign nations.

The principle I allude to is this, that it is wholly immaterial to us, what internal duty is laid upon any commodity of ours by a foreign nation, when that nation does not itself raise or make the article, or some other which is a substitute for it, provided the duty be not so high as to render the article too dear for consumption, and an equal duty be laid on the article from other foreign countries. The reason of it is this, that the consumer in such case, who is the subject of the foreign country, pays the duty. Thus the duty we lay on China wares is immaterial to any foreign nation which manufactures it, because we do not ourselves manufacture it, or a substitute for it, and because it extends equally to the same manufacture of all countries.

This remark will not a little abridge the catalogue of grievances which has been exhibited by the Secretary of State. Indeed, if it were not so, what abundant room for recrimination would our revenue code give to all other countries.

Tobacco is an article, in reference either to France or to Great Britain, to which the observation is peculiarly applicable. Neither of those countries raise it themselves. It is one of those objects of fancy and caprice in respect to which a duty most certainly falls on the consumer. The duties, therefore, upon it in Great Britain can be no concern of ours.

* On re-exportation, there is a drawback of the whole duty on our tobacco, but 3d. per pound retained on re-exportation of foreign tobacco.

Commerce of the United States.

[H. or R.]

mer may tend to prevent its being consumed in such cases in place of the latter.

In the West Indies, the subject wears a different aspect. Rice there makes a part of the common food. A duty upon it tends to prevent its being such, by letting in cheaper substitutes. This reflection operates in favor of the British against the French system, in respect to the West Indies, there being a duty-upon it in the French, none in the British West Indies. But that duty is so light that, from this cause, and its extending to other articles, it ought scarcely to be counted. The prohibition of other foreign rice, however, is a circumstance of some value, assuring to this article from the United States a monopoly of the British West India market.

4. Wood.—This article (the fourth in importance as an export) stood and stands on a decidedly better footing in the British than in the French system. In Great Britain it was and is free from duty, while other foreign rival woods are subject not to some small, as the Secretary of State informs us, but to considerable, and, in several instances, high duties. The observations with regard to this difference, as applied to tobacco, apply to this article in full force, with this additional circumstance, that some of the Northern nations could afford to undersell us, were it not for the protection derived from the high duties on their woods.

In the French West Indies, our wood is subject to a duty of one per cent. ad valorem, with no distinction for or against us. In the British West Indies it is free, with a distinction in our favor, by the prohibition of other foreign wood. The duty, so of the prohibition in the British West Indies of all foreign wood, but from the United States.

5. Fisheries.—Here the comparison is in favor of France, our salted fish being prohibited both in Great Britain and the British West Indies, while it is permitted in France with a duty of 8 livres per quintal, and in the French West Indies with a duty of 5 livres per quintal. Our fish oil being subject in Great Britain, in common with other foreign oil, to a duty of 18s. 5d. sterling per ton of 252 gallons; in France to a duty of 7 livres 4 sous per barrel of 520 pounds, while other foreign oil is prohibited. This last article is prohibited in the West Indies of both countries. While there is no distinction in the system of Great Britain for or against us, that of France, in respect to fish oil, makes a distinction in our favor. But these differences between the two systems appear greater on a superficial than upon a more accurate view. The principle upon which each proceeds is the monopoly of her own market to the productions of her own fisheries, and the exclusion, as far as possible, of all foreign countries, the United States not excepted. But, in pursuing this principle, a difference of situation creates a difference of measures. Great Britain, able to supply herself, prohibits absolutely all foreign salted fish. France, unable to supply herself, but aiming at it with all her strength, lays high duties upon that article, when produced from foreign fisheries, and bestows high premiums upon it when produced from her own fisheries. The duties on foreign and the bounties and premiums on her own fish, would amount to a complete prohibition of ours, if her own fisheries had been able to produce a complete supply; but their incapacity to do this has let ours into the French market, in spite of the discouragements upon it. It merits particular attention, that, in reference to this article, the French system conferred upon us no particular privilege or favor. Other foreign salted fish, in foreign bottoms, stood upon the same footing with our fish, in our bottoms.

Great Britain, less able to supply herself with fish oil than with fish, makes a difference in her system. She does not prohibit the article, but lays a prohibitory duty upon it; but her incapacity to supply herself (as in the case of salted fish with France) lets us into her market with our fine oils, in spite of the discouragement upon ours.

So France, to a considerable duty on our article, adds enormous bounties in favor of the same article the produce of her fisheries. The Secretary of State, in his report on the fisheries, has noticed the measures taken by France to erect her own whale fishery on the ruins of that of the United States. Tempting our fishermen to abandon us and settle at Dunkirk, she allows, for every ton of shipping employed, between nine and ten dollars, with some other advantages. If, in the conduct of Great Britain towards us, in this particular, we discern the spirit of a selfish rival, in that of France, in the same particular, we cannot but see the machinations of an insidious friend. The distinction in favor of our fish oil, as compared with other foreigners, is no counterpoise to the general tendency of the French system, which aimed at excluding us finally from the competition in her markets, though it was deemed preferable, till it could have its full effect, that the United States should enjoy the benefit of the competition, in exclusion of an ancient and formidable rival.

To elucidate still more clearly the spirit of the French system, in this particular, the following facts are submitted to the consideration of the Committee:

1. In August, 1784, the arrêt giving admission to foreign fish in the West India markets was passed. In September, 1785, another arrêt passed, granting a premium of 10 livres per quintal on French fish. Seven days after, so great was their jealousy on this subject, another arrêt passed, raising the duty on foreign fish, including that of the United States, from 3 to 5 livres.

2. An arrêt of the 29th of December, 1787, grants a right of deposit or storing for six months, in France, to all the productions of the United States, in order to re-exportation, paying only a duty of one per cent. In February following, less than two months after, another arrêt passed, excepting from this right all the products of our fisheries, evidently from a jealousy of our interference with the French fisheries.

3. A further explanation of the spirit of the system on this point is to be found in a passage of a report to the National Assembly, in the year 1789, from the Committees of Agriculture and Commerce. After stating a diminution of the product of the French cod fishery, during the year 1789, the report proceeds thus: "This diminution ought to be attributed to the collusion of the English, and Free Americans, who contrived to dispossess the French fisheries by finding means to supply us with their fish, while they eluded the payment of the duty which was imposed on importation, in order to establish a preference in favor of the cod of the French fishery."

6. Pot and Pearl Ashes.—The system of Great Britain is evidently more favorable to this production (sixth in importance of the exports of the United States) than the system of France—the former giving a preference to our article by making it free, while the same article from other foreign countries is subject to a duty of 2s. 3d. per cwt.; the latter placing our article on the same footing with that of other foreign countries. The observations I have made with regard to tobacco apply to this article in full force. In the West India possessions of the two countries it is equally prohibited.

7. Salted Meat.—The regulations of France with regard to this article (seventh in consequence of our exports) are clearly more favorable than those of Great Britain. France admits both beef and pork into her home market, with a duty of 5 livres per quintal; in her West India markets, she admits beef with a duty of one per cent. ad valorem, and 3 livres per quintal, but prohibits pork. Great Britain prohibits both beef and pork in her home and West India markets. Neither country makes any distinction in this particular for or against the United States.

8. Indigo.—This article (eighth in value of our exports) stands upon a decidedly better footing in the system of Great Britain than in that of France. France is herself our competitor in the supply of her own market, and she aims at securing to herself the monopoly of it by adding to the advantage of a superior quality of her own indigo, as asserted by the Secretary of State, the discouragement to ours of double the duty paid on her own. Great Britain admits the article into her home market free of duty. Both countries exclude it from their West India market. Neither make any distinction for or against us.

9. Live Animals.—The regulations both of France and Great Britain may be considered as substantially the same in regard to this article; the small duty of one per cent. ad valorem laid by France in the West Indies, while it is free in the British West Indies, being really of no great consequence. Neither country makes any distinction for or against us.

10. Flaxseed.—The same may be said of this as of the preceding article. If free in Great Britain, it was subject only to a duty of one-eighth per cent. ad valorem in France. It is prohibited in the West Indies of both countries. There is no distinction in the system of either nation for or against us.

11. Naval Stores, viz.: Pitch, Tar, Turpen-line, and Rosin.—These articles were more favored by the system of Great Britain than of France. In the latter, they were subject to a duty of two-and-a-half per cent. ad valorem, with no distinction in our favor. In the former, our tar and pitch are subject to a duty of 11s. per last, while tar and pitch of other countries pay 12s. 4d. per last; our turpentine is subject to a duty of 2s. 3d. per cwt., while that of other countries pays 12s. 9d.; our rosin only 1s. 6d. per cwt., that of other countries 2s. 4d. These duties fall under a like consideration as those on tobacco. The duty on our commodity produced in the British Dominions is no detriment to us. The higher duties on the same commodity from other foreign countries are boundties on ours, in common with the same commodity produced in the British possessions. In the French West Indies, these articles were received upon a duty of one per cent. ad valorem equally with the like articles of other foreign countries. In the British West Indies, besides being free, they enjoy the advantage of a prohibition of the foreign articles.

12. Iron, Bar and Pig.—In respect to this article, likewise, the system of Great Britain is more favorable than that of France. While in France there is no distinction for or against us, in Great Britain, our iron is free, and that of other countries is subject, bar iron, to a duty of from 5s. 2d. to 67s. 2d. per ton; pig iron, to a duty of 5s. 6d. per ton. It is remarkable that Irish iron pays in Great Britain a duty of 30s. 10d. per ton. Both in the French and British West Indies, the article is prohibited. The Secretary of State, to show the insignificance of the discrimination in our favor, observes, that we do not make enough for our own consumption; but this was not foreseen by Great Britain when the discrimination began, having arisen from the late rapid increase of manufactures of iron. This is evinced by the fact that, in a year, ending 30th September, 1790, our export of iron to Great Britain amounted to $81,612.

The foregoing remarks establish clearly that the principal productions of this country, generally speaking, are more favored by the British than by the French commercial system. Here it may be proper to show the amount of the several articles which have been the subject of inquiry exported to the respective dominions of those countries for the period of one year, ending 30th September, 1790:

The total amount of exports to the British and French Dominions, for three years successively, is as follows:

To the Dominions of Great Britain	$9,246,606 00
To the Dominions of France	4,668,902 00
Excess of exportation to the Dominions of Great Britain	4,577,704 00

To the Dominions of Great Britain	$8,269,465 00
To those of France	5,243,543 00
Excess to Great Britain	3,025,922 00

Thus it appears that our exportations to the British Dominions, upon an average of three years, have exceeded those to the French Dominions, in the very considerable sum of $3,752,760 annually. To judge from the fact of our exportations, whether viewed in the detail, according to the table of particular articles, or by the aggregate, for three successive years, established by official documents, there would be no hesitation to pronounce that Great Britain is a more important customer to us than France, not much short, indeed, of the ratio of two to one. But the Secretary of State informs us, "that the greatest part of what she receives from us is re-exported to other countries, under the useless charges of an intermediate deposit and double voyage." The accuracy of this assertion may justly be questioned. It is probably, in a great measure, founded on the statements of Lord Sheffield, without a proper allowance for the change of circumstances. Admitting those statements to be correct, they are no standard for the present state of things. It is known, that, at the period to which they relate, Great Britain had a monopoly of our trade; that we could not, generally speaking, carry our commodities to other countries. Of course, she became an intermediary between us and them, and her re-exportations of our commodities must have been very considerable. But, having had, since the establishment of our independence, free access to other countries, Great Britain has ceased to be an intermediary between them and us, except in those cases in which the direct relations of commerce between us and certain countries render it less convenient to carry our commodities ourselves directly to them, than to use Great Britain as an entrepôt. This, however, is a case of limited extent. For the most part, we carry on a direct commerce with the different countries of Europe. Any rule, drawn, then, from the state of things prior to our Revolution, would be entirely false, in reference to the actual state of things. We may, therefore, venture boldly to question the accuracy of the Secretary of State's assertion, as he does not furnish us with the data on which it is grounded, as from the nature of the thing, it is not probable that any satisfactory ones were possessed by him; and it is improbable, on a general view, that so large a proportion as he supposes is re-exported. But we may satisfy ourselves further, by a more particular view, of the error of his conjecture. The same authority from which, I presume, his suggestions are derived, "that, before the war, one-third of our indigo and three-fourths of our tobacco and rice, carried to Great Britain, were re-exported," informs us that "most, if not all our other articles were consumed there." A document,† before referred to, informs us, in addition, that the average of imports into Great Britain, for six years, ending in 1774, from the United States, was, annually £1,752,142. That the average of six years, ending in 1789, was 908,636 constituting an annual decrease of £834,056 nearly half of the whole amount of former exports. The same document accounts for this difference by stating that the decrease of imports of rice and tobacco from the United States since the war, was—

* Lord Sheffield's Observations on the Commerce of the American States, p. 228.
† Report of the Lords of the Privy Council, Ap. 91.

Tobacco -	-	-	-	£582,987	6	0
Rice -	-	-	-	196,526	15	4
Making together -	-	-	-	£779,514	1	4

Our own documents prove, in respect to the article of tobacco, that more than one-half of our export is directly from the United States to countries other than Great Britain. The decrease in the articles of tobacco and rice is a convincing proof that we now carry, ourselves, to other foreign markets, the principal part of that proportion of these articles which used formerly to be carried to Great Britain and re-exported from thence. When we consider this fact, and the small proportion which indigo bears to our whole export, the probability of that article re-exported, and that these three articles are the only considerable ones of re-exportation, we must conclude that there is great exaggeration in the supposition that the greatest part of our commodities now carried to Great Britain is re-exported from thence. There appears to be a strong probability that the allowance of one-third of our whole exports to Great Britain for re-exportation would be ample. Let us, then, take this proportion as a rule of calculation. With regard to the British Dominions other than Great Britain herself, the idea of re-exportation is not more applicable to them than to the dominions of France. Let us, according to these data, compute the probable consumption of Great Britain for the years before mentioned. The computation will stand thus:

For the year ending 30th September, 1790.
Two-thirds the export to Great Britain herself -	-	-	-	£4,592,682
Whole of exports to her other Dominions -	-	-	-	2,357,583
Actual consumption of British Dominions -	-	-	-	6,950,265
Total exports to French Dominions in that year -	-	-	-	4,668,902
Excess of actual consumption of British Dominions beyond total of exportation of French Dominions -	-	-	-	2,281,363

For the year ending 30th September, 1791.
Two-thirds of export to Great Britain herself -	-	-	-	£3,295,032
Whole exports to her other Dominions -	-	-	-	3,010,868
Actual consumption of British Dominions -	-	-	-	6,305,900
Total exports to French Dominions -	-	-	-	4,298,762
Excess of actual consumption of British Dominions beyond total of exportation to French Dominions -	-	-	-	2,007,138

For the year ending 30th September, 1792.
Two-thirds of export to Great Britain herself -	-	-	-	£3,170,832
Whole exportation to her other Dominions -	-	-	-	3,513,217
Actual consumption of British Dominions -	-	-	-	6,684,049
Total exports to French Dominions -	-	-	-	5,243,543
Excess -	-	-	-	1,440,506

From this view, it may rationally be inferred that Great Britain and her dominions actually consumed, annually, of our commodities, two millions of dollars more in value than France and her dominions. The comparison upon these years is particularly favorable to France. In the markets of Great Britain and her dominions things have gone on during the whole time in their natural course, while, in those of France and her dominions, from the relaxations incident to a state of revolution and convulsion, and from the additional wants created by the same causes our commodities have found a much greater latitude in their markets than they would enjoy in settled times.

We have seen that, in the years 1786 and 1788, a very small quantity of flour was exported to France and her dominions. (for Philadelphia is, in this case, a good standard for the whole,) while, in the years upon which the computation has been just made, this article has been the principal item in the supplies to the French Dominions. The just inference is, that, in settled times, Great Britain, with her dominions, has been, and would be, a much better customer to the United States, as a consumer, than France with her dominions.

But the stress which is laid upon the re-exportations from Great Britain, as diminishing her value as a customer, is founded on false principles. Since we have access to the countries to which she re-exports some of our commodities, we shall carry them there ourselves, in every case in which it is our interest to do so. In order, however, to its being our interest to do so, it is necessary not only that the countries in question should stand in need of our commodities, but that they should have commodities, which it would be convenient for us to receive in exchange. Otherwise, especially where distant voyages are to be performed, our vessels would find sufficient employment to render voyages profitable, nor would the capital employed be always turned to due advantage. Again, the nature of the trade may be such as to require greater capital for carrying it on with advantage than our merchants may possess, and the capital of our merchants, left free by the interposition of foreign capitals, may flow in a course of more beneficial employment.

In such a state of things, if there were no nation whose relations with the countries in question made it convenient to be an intermediary between us and them, our commodities would not find their way thither in equal quantities to what they now do, if at all. The intervention of Great Britain, therefore, may, in most cases, be considered as a mean of extending instead of abridging our commerce, and that intervention may be no less beneficial to us, than if she were herself the consumer of the commodities.

The fact of Great Britain being an intermediary, as far as it is true, being then the result of the natural course of trade, left to itself, is a proof that it is the interest of the United States that she should stand, in the cases supposed, in the relation in which she does stand, between us and other foreign countries. There is, therefore, nothing of weight in the observation, that the quantities of our commodities which Great Britain receives, and re-exports, are greater than "reason or national interest would dictate."

IMPORTS.

I shall proceed, in the next place, to a view of our import trade with the dominions of France and Britain.

These, in the year taken by Mr. JEFFERSON, were—

From Great Britain and her dominions -	-	-	-	$15,285,428
From France and her dominions -	-	-	-	2,068,348

From the Secretary's statement, it appears, that about three-fourths of our imports come from Great Britain and her dominions, of which a considerable part is from the West Indies. This, too, seems to be considered by some persons as a grievance. But it is among the circumstances which demonstrate to an unbiassed mind, the great importance and utility of our trade with Great Britain; nor can an alteration be made, but by means violent and contrary to our interests; except in a way which is not the object of the Report, namely, an efficacious system of encouragement to home manufactures. Every effort to turn the tide of trade from Great Britain to other countries, will amount to a premium upon the manufactures and productions of those countries, at the expense of the people of the United States.

How does it happen that the imports from Great Britain are so considerable? Evidently from two causes:

1st. Because Great Britain, aggregately considered, is unquestionably the first manufacturing country in the world, and can supply us with the greatest number of articles we want, on the best terms.

2d. Because her merchants have large capitals, and can afford to give us extensive credit. Our merchants, in general, have small capitals, and want credit.

Both the one and the other circumstance make it the interest of this country to deal with that to the extent we do.

It is manifestly our interest to be supplied with the manufactures we want, of the best quality, and on the best terms, and to take them from that country which is most able to furnish them. Deficient in capital ourselves, it has been very useful to us to find a country which could supply that deficiency; no circumstance has tended more to the interests of this country to those of others.

nourish the industry, the agriculture, and the commerce of this country, and to advance its growth; and, though in a far less degree, it continues still to have the same effect. In proportion as we have less need of our own capital, to purchase the foreign commodities we want, is our ability to use it, in the exportation of our own, in ship building and navigation, in manufactures, and other internal improvements, and in the payment of the national revenue.

There is no country in the world in a situation to benefit so much by the aid of foreign capital, as the United States. This arises not only from the inadequateness, compared with the objects of employment of our own capital, but from the condition in which we are, with numerous resources unexplored and undeveloped.

But, it has been said, that France can supply us with many articles better than Great Britain. This expression, better, ought to include credit, as well as price and quality; for, if we stand in need of credit, that country which cannot give it to us, cannot supply us on as good terms as the country which can. Now, it is known that the merchants of France are unable or unwilling to give competent credit to our merchants. Moreover, though it may be true that France can supply us with some articles of as good, or better quality than Great Britain, the number and extent of them is small, compared with the number and extent of the articles with which Great Britain and Ireland can furnish us, of better quality, and, quality considered, cheaper than France. The great bulk of the articles we import from Europe, consists of hard-wares, earthen ware, manufactures of cotton and wool, and linens; all of which, for general use, can be had better from Britain and Ireland than from other countries. The present extremely deranged state of the manufactures of France, is not here noticed, as the argument is deemed sufficiently strong without it. Every man of business knows that it is of moment to a merchant, to find a various and well assorted cargo, and that it is, generally speaking, his interest to go to that place where he can obtain the greatest variety of the articles of his trade, though some of them may not be upon equally good terms, rather than go to another, where he cannot have the same variety and assortment of good articles, though he might be able to obtain there a few of better quality and lower price. Hence, Great Britain is, in every view, the best supplier of this country. As trade has been hitherto left to find its own channels, the presumption is, that it has flowed into those where its natural relations and its best interests have led.

I shall not deny that it would be desirable, in order to diminish our dependence for supply on one nation, that others could attract a portion of the trade we have with Great Britain, by being able to supply us equally well with what we want, and in a manner which would make it the interest of our merchants to turn their attention towards them. But it will not follow that such change ought to be brought about by artificial methods. Indeed, this cannot be done, without sacrificing the interests of this country to those of others.

To lessen the importation of the commodities of Great Britain, as far as it may be practicable, we must have recourse to prohibitions or to duties much higher than those paid by other countries on the like articles, as to counterbalance the disadvantages they labor under, in the competition for our market. Either method will operate as a bounty upon the commodities of certain foreign nations, to the prejudice of others, which bounty will be paid at the expense of our citizens. A prohibition, by lessening the competition of foreign nations, and of course the quantity of goods brought to market, would increase the price of the goods of those nations to whom the monopoly was given; our citizens would consequently pay dearer for their supply, and would sustain a positive expense to support, not their own industry and manufactures, but those of other countries. The same effect would happen in the case of additional duties; they would either exclude the articles of the countries upon which they were laid, and operate as a prohibition, or, if they did not, they would tend to raise the prices of all articles of the same kind, from whatever country brought; those who import the highly dutied articles would endeavor to incorporate the duty with the price, because they could not afford to do otherwise. The importers from the other countries would take advantage of this circumstance to increase their profit, and would add proportionally to the price of their commodities. But the very necessity of laying high duties to favor the competition of other countries, supposes that they cannot afford to sell their commodities of equal quality as cheap as the country on whose commodities the duties are laid, and aims, by rendering these dearer, to bring them at least to the level of those which were before undersold. It results, that the people of the United States will have to pay higher prices than formerly, and this, as already observed, not for their own advantage, but for that of foreigners.

Among the contrivances used to depreciate the value of our commercial connexion with Great Britain is this, that the credit which she gives us is pernicious by inducing us to run in debt. As well might it be said, that the credit which a settler of new land obtains, upon the land which he has purchased, or that which a tailor gets upon the cloth which he works up, in the course of his trade, is prejudicial. The truth is, that credit, though liable to abuse, is the substitute for capital in all trades, and that it serves to foster them and increase the mass of industry, though the slothful and extravagant suffer by it. In a young country, like ours, it is an essential nutriment.

If we turn to the West Indies, there, too, the comparison as to our supply is in favor of Great Britain. While, from the French West Indies, the permanent system of France allows us to have nothing but molasses and rum, that of Great Britain allows us not only to have those articles, but, in addition to them, sugar, coffee, cocoa, ginger, pimento, and salt, and that directly from the islands; while the general rule is, that they cannot be carried directly to any other foreign country. It ought to be deemed no inconsiderable advantage to have a direct supply from the islands of necessities and comforts so important to us, and to be relieved from the inconvenience and expense of getting them by the circuitous route of Europe; an advantage to which we were left by the system of France, as far as it could be executed. Its having been in a great degree frustrated by Colonial relaxations and contraband practices, does not alter the complexion of that system.

It follows, from what has been said, that Great Britain is our best furnisher, as well as our best customer.

NAVIGATION.

In all the points upon which the comparison of our commerce with Great Britain and France has hitherto turned, the advantage is on the side of that which we carry on with Great Britain. The only point of further comparison respects our navigation.

In the trade immediately between the United States and Great Britain, as far as respects our own commodities, our ships are upon the same footing with those of Great Britain, (with the exception, only, of 1s. 9d. sterling per ton, for light and Trinity dues, paid more on ours than on British vessels, in all the ports of England, but London,) and on a better footing than those of other foreign Powers; for, while they pay upon the carriage of several of their own commodities, additional duties, called alien duties, our ships are exempt from them. This is a discrimination of some consequence in our favor, beneficial not only to our navigation, but to our agriculture. It is, to a certain extent, a departure, in our favor, from the principle of her Navigation Act.

In the trade between the United States and France, our ships are upon the same footing with the most favored nations, not better. So far, therefore, the comparison is in favor of the system of Great Britain. But France allows us to carry thither foreign commodities in our bottoms, which Great Britain does not permit. This is an advantage, but it is one which we enjoy in common with other nations, and its importance, in fact, has hitherto not been very great, though it has been rendered greater than it would naturally be, by the disordered state of her West India affairs.

The point truly interesting to us is the carriage of our own commodities. From the British West Indies our vessels are entirely excluded, (except in the instance of salt from Turk's Island,) while France admits into her islands our vessels of sixty tons and upwards, in common with the like vessels of other foreign countries. The comparison, therefore, in respect to the West Indies, is entirely in favor of France. It may not be improper to remark, incidentally, that it is far more important to us to have our navigation upon a good footing with the European dominions of Great Britain than with her West India possessions. This is evinced by considering that our exports to her West Indies are, upon an average, less than a third of our exports to her European dominions. But, upon the whole, the system of France may be considered as more favorable to our navigation than that of Great Britain. Yet the effect, as to the quantity of our tonnage employed in our trade with those countries, is very different from that which is suggested in the Report of the Secretary of State, who has, in this respect, pursued a very erroneous guide. He states the tonnage employed between the United States and the dominions of France at 116,410 tons; the dominions of Great Britain, 43,380 tons. But this statement is taken, not according to the number of ships employed, but according to the number of inward entries made by each. Of course a vessel of one hundred tons, making two voyages in a year to and from Great Britain, (as much as can usually be made,) would appear, by the duties, only as two hundred tons; whereas the same, or another vessel of equal burden, making four voyages in a year to the French West Indies, (which can without difficulty be done,) would appear, by the same entries, as four hundred tons; so that our navigation with the British dominions, being entirely with those of Europe, where the voyages in a year are few, and with the French dominions, being chiefly with the West Indies, where the voyages in a year are frequent, it might happen that the returns which have been followed by the Secretary of State would show, nominally, double the quantity of tonnage employed between the United States and the dominions of France than between the United States and the dominions of Great Britain, while, in fact, we might have more actual tonnage employed in the latter than in the former case. An inaccuracy of this nature demonstrates the incorrect manner in which the Report has been framed. According to a return lately made to this House, the real proportion of actual tonnage of the United States employed in our trade with the dominions of France and Great Britain, in the year ending 30th September, 1792, is as follows: with those of France, 82,510 tons; with those of Great Britain, 66,582 tons. We find, then, upon a comprehensive and particular investigation of the system of Great Britain, that, instead of its wearing an aspect particularly unfriendly to us, it has, in fact, a contrary aspect; that, compared with other foreign nations, it makes numerous and substantial discriminations in our favor; that it secures, by means which operate as bounties upon our commodities, a preference in her markets to the greatest number of our principal productions, and thereby materially promotes our agriculture and commerce; that, in the system of France, there is but a single and not very important instance of a similar kind; that, if France allows us some advantage of navigation in her islands, she allows the same advantages to all other foreign nations, while Great Britain allows advantages to our navigation with herself directly which she does not allow to other foreign nations; that, if France admits our salted fish into her West India islands, she does it under such duties upon ours, and such premiums upon her own, as would exclude us from them, if she had capacity to supply herself, while she formally prohibits our flour; that, if Great Britain excludes our fish from her islands, she freely admits our flour; that while France, as far as we are permitted to trade with her islands, lets in other foreign nations to a competition with us on equal terms, Great Britain excludes from a competition with most of the articles of the United States, which she admits into the islands, the like articles of other foreign countries; that, while France permits us to be supplied directly from her islands with nothing more than she permits to other nations, and with only the two articles of molasses and rum, Great Britain allows us to be supplied directly from her islands with a considerable number of essential articles, and refuses a direct supply of those articles to other foreign countries; that, if the system of France is somewhat more favorable to our navigation, that of Great Britain is far more favorable to our agriculture, our commerce, and to the due and comfortable supply of our wants; that Great Britain is a better furnisher than France of the articles we want from other foreign countries, and a better customer for what we have to sell; and that the actual relations of commerce between the United States and Great Britain are more extensive and important than between the United States and France, and it may be added, or any other country in the world, for our trade with France is no doubt second in importance. Where, then, is the ground for extolling the liberal policy of France, the superior importance of our commercial connexion with her, and for exclaiming against the illiberal and oppressive policy of Great Britain, and for representing our intercourse with her as secondary in consequence and utility? There is none. It is altogether a deception, which has been long successfully practised upon the people of the United States, and which it is high time we should unmask. If we pass from the fact of the footing of our commerce with France and Great Britain to the principles and motives of their respective systems, we shall find as little room for eulogium on the one as censure on the other. Candor will assign to both the same station in our good or bad opinion. Both, like other nations, have aimed at securing the greatest possible portion of benefit to themselves, with no greater concession to our interests than was supposed to coincide with their own. The Colonial systems of France is the great theme of the plaudits of her partisans. The detail already entered into respecting it will now be further elucidated by a concise view of its general principles and progress. An ordinance of the year 1757, like the British Navigation Act, had given to the mother country a monopoly of the trade of the Colonies, and had entirely excluded foreigners from it. Experience having shown, as we learn from an ordinance of August 30, 1784, that it was necessary to moderate the rigor of that system, small relaxations from time to time accordingly took place; and, by the ordinance just mentioned, more important alterations were made. That ordinance establishes several free ports in the French islands: one at St. Lucia, one at Martinique, one at Guadaloupe, one at Tobago, and three at St. Domingo, and grants permission, "till the King should please otherwise to ordain," to foreign vessels of at least sixty tons burden, to carry to wood of all kinds, pit coal, live beef, but not pork, salted cod fish, corn, vegetables, green hides in the peltry, turpentine, and tar, and to take from the same ports molasses, rum, and merchandises, which have been imported from France, charging the articles which are permitted to be imported with the duties stated in the table. The steps with the duties that ordinance, calculated to narrow its operation in regard to the articles of fish, have been already noted so particularly as to render a recapitulation unnecessary. It is sufficient to repeat that they manifested on this point a decided disposition to exclude, as far as possible, foreign from a competition with their own fish. It appears, then, that the general principle of the Colony system of France, like that of Great Britain, was a system of monopoly, and that some temporary deviations from it were from time to time made, from necessity or the force of circumstances. In like manner the Navigation Act of Great Britain gives the mother country a monopoly of the trade of her Colonies, not only as to navigation, but as to supply; but the force of circumstances has led to some deviations. The deviations of France have extended partially to navigation, as well as to supply. Those of Great Britain have extended further than those of France, as to supply, but have been narrower as to navigation. Neither, however, has deviated further than particular situation dictated. Great Britain has been less relaxed on the article of navigation than France, because the means of navigation possessed by the former were more adequate than those possessed by the latter. France has been more restrictive on the article of exports than Great Britain, because her home market was more adequate to the consumption of the productions of her islands than that of Great Britain to those of her islands, and because the latter found advantages in allowing a free export to the United States as an article of exchange. France permitted the introduction of salted beef and fish into her islands, because she could not sufficiently furnish those articles herself; she prohibited flour and pork, because she thought herself competent to the supply of them. Great Britain prohibited fish, because she knew herself able to furnish it, and, like France, was jealous of an interference with her fisheries, as a main support of her navigation. She permitted flour, because she knew herself unable to supply it. As far as the measures of France may have had a conciliatory aspect towards this country, she was influenced by the desire of sharing more largely in our trade, and diverting it more from her ancient rival. As far as the measures of Great Britain may have made any concession to us, they have proceeded from a sense of our importance to her as a customer, from the utility of our supplies to her, from a conviction that it was necessary to facilitate to us the means of re-exchange; that it was better to take our commodities which were paid for in commodities, than those of other countries which she might have to pay for in specie; that it was good policy to give us some douceur, as well to hinder our commerce from running into another channel, as to prevent collisions which might be mutually injurious. These are the true features of the systems of both countries, as to motives. If we are unprejudiced we shall see in neither of them either enmity or particular friendship; but we shall see in both a predominant principle of self-interest, the universal rule of national conduct.

Having completed my comparison of the two systems of France and Great Britain towards this country, I shall now extend it to those of other countries, in order to mark the principal differences.

[Here Mr. Smith described the situation of our commercial relations with the United Netherlands, Sweden, Spain, Portugal, and Denmark, and drew the conclusion that the system of Great Britain, not only as compared with that of France, was entitled to our preference, but that it was also greatly to be preferred to that of all the before-mentioned nations, except, perhaps, the United Netherlands.] He then continued his speech as follows:

From the view which has been taken, this general reflection results, that the system of every country is selfish according to its circumstances, and contains all those restrictions and exclusions which it deems useful to its own interest. Besides this, a desire to secure to the mother country a monopoly of the trade of its Colonies, is a predominant feature in the system of almost every country in Europe. Nor is it without foundation in reason. Colonies, especially small islands, are usually maintained and defended at the expense of the mother country, and it seems a natural recompense for that service, that the mother country should enjoy, exclusively of other nations, the benefit of trade with its Colonies. This was thought reasonable by the United States, while Colonies, even after their disputes on the point of taxation had begun; and however the question may stand between the mother country and its Colonies, between the former and foreign nations, it is not easy to see how the equity of the exclusion can be contested. At any rate, its being the most prevailing system of nations having Colonies, there is no room for acrimony against a particular one that pursues it. This ought not to dissuade the United States from availing itself of every just and proper influence to gain admission into the Colony trade of the nations concerned; but this object ought to be pursued with moderation, not under the instigation of a sense of injury, but on the ground of temperate negotiation and reasonable equivalent.

These observations ought to produce two effects, to moderate our resentments against particular nations and our partialities for others, and to evince the impracticability and Quixotism of an attempt by violence, on the part of this young country, to break through the fetters which the universal policy of nations imposes on their intercourse with each other.

Our moderation in this respect ought to be excited by another reflection—does not our own system present a number of exclusions and restrictions similar to those of which we complain? Let us look into our impost and tonnage acts; do they not exhibit a number of instances of duties prohibitory in their principle and extent? Do they not, by additional duties on foreign vessels and on goods brought in foreign vessels, secure a decided superiority to our ships in the navigation between this country and all those to which they are permitted to go? If duties on goods of one country, imported into another, are oppressions and grievances, (as the Secretary of State seems frequently to suppose,) how few are the foreign articles brought into the United States, on which considerable duties are not laid.

The Secretary of State, after pointing out the exclusions, restrictions, and burdens, which prevent our enjoying all the advantages which we could desire in the trade with foreign countries, proceeds to indicate the remedies; these are counter-exclusions, restrictions, and burdens.

The reason of the thing and the general observations of the Secretary of State, would extend the regulations to be adopted to all the nations with whom we have connections in trade; but his conclusion would seem to confine them to Great Britain, on the suggestion that she alone has declined friendly arrangements by treaty, and that there is no reason to conclude, that friendly arrangements would be declined by other nations.

The suggestion with regard to Great Britain, appears not to be well founded, if we are to judge from the correspondence of the British Minister, Mr. Hammond, communicated by the President to the House. Mr. Jefferson asks him if he is empowered to treat on the subject of commerce; he replies, that he is fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for that purpose, though not as yet empowered to conclude. Upon further difficulty and objection on the part of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Hammond renews his assurance of his competency to enter on a negotiation, which he rests on his commissions, as Minister Plenipotentiary, and his instructions; Mr. Jefferson requires a communication of his full powers for that purpose, and declines the negotiation. This was by no construction a declining on the part of the British Minister. Forms were the obstacle with the Secretary of State, whose zeal, at best, was not greater than Mr. Hammond's.

But with regard to Spain, these observations occur. A secret article with France, stipulated for Spain a right to become a party to our commercial treaty with France, on the same terms. She has never availed herself of the right. Do we not know, that measures have been since pursued towards forming a treaty of commerce with her? Do we not know that none has been formed? Have we not reason to suspect, that such a treaty, on eligible terms, could not be obtained but at a price which we should be unwilling to pay for it? Have no measures been pursued towards effecting a commercial treaty with a power so interesting to us as Portugal? What was the object of sending a Minister there? How happens it, that there is no return? Is not there reason to conclude, from the long delay, that there are serious obstacles to the forming a proper treaty of commerce with that nation?

Why, then, is Great Britain selected, but that it is most in unison with our passions to enter into collisions with her?

If retaliations for restrictions, exclusions, and burdens, are to take place, they ought to be dealt out, with a proportional hand, to all those from whom they are experienced. This, justice and an inoffensive conduct, require. If, suffering equal impediments to our trade from one Power as another, we retaliate on one and not on another, we manifest that we are governed by a spirit of hostility towards the Power against whom our retaliation is directed, and we ought to count upon a reciprocation of that spirit. If, suffering fewer from one than from another, we retaliate only on that party from whom we suffer least, the spirit of enmity, by which we were actuated, becomes more unequivocal. If, receiving a positively better treatment from one than another, we deal most harshly towards that Power which treats us best, will it be an evidence either of justice or moderation? Will it not be a proof either of caprice, or of a hatred and aversion, of a nature to overrule the considerations both of equity and prudence?

Whatever questions may be raised about the preference due to the British commercial system, as compared with that of France, there can be none, comparing it either with that of Spain or Portugal.

Where, then, is the justification of the attempt to produce a war of commercial regulations with Great Britain, passing over greater objections to the policy observed towards us by other nations?

Commercial regulations ought to be bottomed on commercial motives; but, if political grievances are to be implicated, is there no Power proposed to be exempted, of whom we have cause to complain?

The propositions, (which may be considered as a commentary on the report,) do every thing but name Great Britain. Professedly confined to the Powers with whom we have no treaties of commerce, the articles selected, as the objects of regulation, have scarcely any application but to Great Britain. This is but a flimsy cover; the design will be mistaken by no one, and there would have been much more dignity in naming the party with whom it was meant to contend.

The idea of an apportionment of retaliation to grievance is rendered impossible by our treaties. These contain precise stipulations of mutual privileges, and in each case the general principle of the party being on the footing of the most favored nation.

But at least it might be done with regard to the Powers with whom we have no treaties, and the not proposing it will be considered as a clear proof that the ostensible object is one thing, the real object another.

Will it be believed out of doors that all this proceeds from a pure zeal for the advancement of commerce and navigation? Have the views of our public councils been uniform on this point?

Have they never contributed to those favorable opportunities for making such a treaty, by recalling powers for that purpose once given, by defeating efforts made to send them when they might have been useful?

Whatever may be the motive, the operation may clearly be pronounced to be a phenomenon in political history—a Government attempting to aid commerce by throwing it into confusion; by obstructing the most precious channels in which it flows; under the pretence of making it flow more freely; by damming up the best outlet for the surplus commodities of the country, and the best inlet for the supplies of which it stands in need; by disturbing, without temptation, a beneficial course of things, in an experiment precarious, if not desperate; by arresting the current of a prosperous and progressive navigation, to transfer it to other countries, and by making all this wild work in the blameable, but feeble attempt to build up the manufactures and trade of another country at the expense of the United States.

Let us take a closer view of the project. It has been proved that it does not rest on a basis of distributive justice, and observations have been made to evince its impolicy. But this demands a more critical examination.

Let it be premised, that it is a project calculated to disturb the existing course of three-fourths of our import trade, two-fifths of our export trade, and the means on which depend two-thirds, at least, of our revenues.

To be politic, therefore, it ought to unite these different ingredients:

First. An object of adequate utility to the country.

Second. A moral certainty, at least, of success.

Third. An assurance that the advantage likely to be obtained is not overbalanced by the inconveniences likely to be incurred, and as an equivalent for the jeopardy to which advantages in our possession are exposed.

1st. The direct object professed to be aimed at, is a freer trade with Great Britain, and access to her West India Islands, in our own ships. A collateral one, the success of which seems most relied on, is to transfer a part of our too great trade with Great Britain to other nations, particularly France.

The first is no doubt an object of real magnitude, worthy of every reasonable and promising exertion. The second, in the single light of obviating a too great dependence for supply on one nation, is not unworthy of attention, but, as before observed, it ought only to be aimed at by expedients neither embarrassing nor expensive; it is a very insufficient object to be pursued either at hazard or expense to the people of the United States. It has been already shown, that to pursue it, either by prohibitions or partial increase of duties, would be a costly undertaking to this country.

2d. The second ingredient is "a moral certainty of success." The argument used to prove the probability, nay, the certainty of success, is this: the United States are a most important customer to Great Britain; they now take off near three millions in her manufactures, and by the progress of their population, which is likely to exceed that of their manufactures, the probability is, that their importance as a customer will increase, every year; their importance to Great Britain, as a source of supply, is not less than as a customer for her manufactures; the articles with which they furnish her, are those of prime necessity, consisting of the means of subsistence, and the materials for shipbuilding and manufactures, while the articles we derive from her, are mostly those of convenience and luxury; her supplies to us are therefore less useful than ours to her; that it would be contrary to all good policy in Great Britain, to hazard the turning of a commerce so beneficial, into other channels; besides all this, Great Britain is immersed in debt, and in a state of decrepitude; derangement of our commerce with her, would endanger a shock to the whole fabric of her credit, and by affecting injuriously the interests of a great portion of her mercantile body, and by throwing out of employ a large number of her manufacturers, would raise a clamor against the Ministry too loud and too extensive to be resisted; and that they would consequently be compelled, by the weight of these considerations, to yield to our wishes.

It is as great an error in the Councils of a country to over-rate as to under-rate its importance. The foregoing argument does this, and it does it in defiance of experience. Similar arguments were formerly used in favor of a non-importation scheme; the same consequences now foretold, were then predicted in the most sanguine manner; but the prediction was not fulfilled. This it would seem, ought to be a caution to us now, and ought to warn us against relying upon the like effects, promised from a measure of much less force, namely, an increase of duties.

If our calculations are made on the ordinary course of the human passions, or on a just estimate of relative advantages for the contest proposed, we shall not be sanguine in expecting that the victory will be readily yielded to us, or that it will be easily obtained.

The Navigation Act of Great Britain, the principles of which exclude us from the advantages we wish to enjoy, is deemed by English politicians, as the palladium of her riches, greatness, and security.

After having cherished it for such a long succession of years, after having repeatedly hazarded much for the maintenance of it, with so strong a conviction of its immense importance, is it at all probable that she would surrender it to us without a struggle—that she would permit us to extort the abandonment of it from her without a serious trial of strength?

Prejudices riveted by time and habit, opinions fixed by long experience of advantages, a sense of interest, irritated pride, a spirit of resentment at the attempt, all these strong circumstances would undoubtedly prompt to resistance. It would be felt, that if a concession were made to us upon the strength of endeavors to extort it, the whole system must be renounced; it would be perceived that the way having been once successfully pointed out to other nations, would not fail to be followed, and that a surrender to one would be a surrender to all.

Resistance, therefore, would certainly follow in one or other mode, a war of arms, or of commercial regulations.

If the first should be determined upon, it would not be difficult for Great Britain to persuade the other Powers with whom she is united, that they ought to make common cause with her. She would represent that our regulations were in fact only a covert method of taking part in the war by embarrassing her, and that it was the interest of the cause in which they were combined, to frustrate our attempts.

If war could be foreseen as the certain consequence of the experiment proposed to be made, no arguments would be necessary to dissuade from it. Every body would be sensible that more was to be lost than gained, and that so great a hazard ought not to be run.

But we are assured that there is no danger of this consequence, that no nation would have a right to take umbrage at any regulations we should adopt with regard to our own trade, and that Great Britain would take care how she put to risk so much as she would hazard by a quarrel with us.

All this is far more plausible than solid. Experience has proved to us that the Councils of that country are influenced by passion as well as our own. If we should seize the present moment to attack her in a point where she is peculiarly susceptible, she would be apt to regard it as a mark of determined hostility. This would naturally tend to kindle those sparks of enmity which are alleged to exist on her side. War is as often the result of resentment as of calculation. A direct and immediate war between us would not be surprising; but if this should not take place, mutual ill offices and irritations, which naturally grow out of such a state of things, would be apt quickly to lead to it. Insults and aggressions might become so multiplied and open as not to permit forbearance on either side.

It would be a calculation with Great Britain whether she could best oppose us by retaliating regulations, or by arms. As circumstances at the moment of deliberation should point, according to the then view of probabilities, would be the result. The decision may be in favor of war, under the idea that its distresses might induce us to enter into a commercial treaty upon her own terms; who can pronounce that this would not be the result, when it is considered that she is likely to be aided by so many other maritime powers now in her connexion? Let us, however, take it for granted, that she would prefer the other course, that of retaliating regulations; how will the contest stand? The proportion of the whole exports of Great Britain, which comes to the United States, is about one-fifth; the proportion of our exports, which goes to Great Britain, is about one-eighth of the whole amount of her imports. Taking the mean of these proportions of imports and exports, the proportion which our trade with Great Britain bears to the totality of her trade is about one-sixth.

The proportion of imports from the dominions of Great Britain into the United States, may be stated at three-fourths of our whole importation; the proportion which our exports to the same dominions bears to our total exportation may be stated at two-fifths; taking the mean of those two, the proportion which our trade with Great Britain bears to our whole trade is something more than one-half.

It follows, then, that while a commercial warfare with Great Britain would disturb the course of about one-sixth of her trade, it would disturb the course of more than one-half of ours.

This much greater proportional derangement of our trade than of hers by a contest, is a mathematical demonstration that the contest would be unequal on our part; that we should put more to hazard than Great Britain would do; should be likely to suffer greater inconvenience than her, and consequently, (the resolution and perseverance of the two parties being supposed equal,) would be soonest induced to abandon the contest.

The inequality of the contest is evinced by these further considerations. The capital of Great Britain is greater in proportion to numbers than ours. A manufacturing, as well as an agricultural nation, the objects of her industry and the materials of her trade are as much diversified as can be well conceived, while ours are few and simple. The habits of her people admit of her bringing into action every source of revenue which she possesses, while those of ours embarrass the Government at every step, and would render substitutes for the existing ones extremely difficult. The Government of Great Britain has all the energy which can be derived either from the nature of a Government, or from long habits of obedience in the people, while ours is in its infancy—neither confirmed by age nor habit, and with many circumstances to lessen its force. No one can but be sensible, that in proportion to the capital of a merchant or a nation, is the faculty to endure partial derangements to the trade carried on by the one or the other; that in proportion to the diversity of objects which a merchant or a nation can bring to market, is the faculty to find new resources of trade, and to bear the temporary suspension of existing ones; that in proportion to the habitude of a nation to endure taxation, is the facility of a Government to find substitutes for revenues lost; that in proportion to the energy of a Government and the habits of obedience of a people, is the chance of perseverance on the part of such Government, in measures producing inconveniences to the community.

Great Britain then would have less to resist and more means of resistance than the United States; the United States more to resist and less means of resistance than Great Britain. Which party are the chances against in such a contest? Can any one say that the United States ought, in such a comparative situation, to count on success in an experiment like that proposed, with sufficient as-insurance to be justified in hazarding upon it so great a derangement of its affairs, as may result from the measure?

The main argument for the chance of success, is, that our supplies to Great Britain are more necessary to her than hers to us. But this is a position which our self-love gives more credit to than facts will altogether authorize. Well-informed men in other countries, (whose opportunities of information are at least as good as ours,) affirm, that Great Britain can obtain a supply of most of the articles she obtains from us, as cheap and of as good a quality elsewhere, with only two exceptions, namely, tobacco and grain, and the latter is only occasionally wanted; a considerable substitute for our tobacco, though not of equal quality, may be had elsewhere; and even admitting this position to be too strongly stated, yet there is no good reason to doubt that it is in a great degree true. The Colonies of the different European Powers on this Continent, some countries of the Mediterranean, and the Northern countries of Europe, are in situations adapted to becoming our competitors.

On the other hand, the manufactured articles which we do not make ourselves, (the greatest part of which are, in civilized countries, necessities,) are as important to us as our materials for manufacture (the only articles for which her demand is constant,) are to Great Britain. The position is as true, that no other nation can supply us as well as that country, with several essential articles which we want, as that no nation can supply her equally well with certain articles which she takes from us; and as to other articles of subsistence, it is certain that our demand for manufactured supplies is more constantly urgent than her demand for those articles. Where, indeed, shall we find a substitute for the vast supply of manufactures which we get from that country? No gentleman will say that we can suddenly replace them by our own manufacture, or that this, if practicable, could be done without a violent distortion of the natural course of our industry. A substitute of our own being out of the question, where else shall we find one?

France was the Power which could best have filled any chasm that might have been created. But this is no longer the case. It is undeniable that the money capitals of that country have been essentially destroyed; that manufacturing establishments, except those for war, have been essentially deranged. The destruction to which Lyons appears to be doomed, is a severe blow to the manufactures of France; that city, second in importance, in all respects, was perhaps the first in manufacturing importance. It is more than probable that France, for years to come, will herself want a foreign supply of manufactured articles. At a moment, then, when the manufactures of Great Britain have become more necessary than ever to us, can we expect to succeed in a contest which supposes that we can dispense with them? It may be said that the resolutions proposed do not suppose this; but they do suppose it, for they ought to proceed upon the possibility, nay, probability, that a system of commercial retaliation will be adopted by Great Britain, in which case we must inevitably sustain a defeat, if we cannot dispense both with her supplies and with her market for our supplies.

Will it be answered that her manufactures will find their way to us circuitously, and our supplies to her in like manner? If so, what are our regulations to produce but distress and loss to us? The manufactures of Great Britain will still be consumed, and our materials will still nourish those manufactures.

The manufactures we take from her being less bulky than the supplies we send her, the charges of a circuitous transportation would be less than those of a like transportation of our commodities. In all the cases, therefore, in which those charges fall upon her, they would be lighter than in the cases in which the latter charges fell upon us. Moreover, as the articles of Great Britain would meet less competition in our markets than ours in hers, the increased charges on her manufactures would much oftener fall upon us than those upon our materials would fall upon her. So that both ways we should sustain loss.

But, if may be asked, what are the regulations Great Britain could adopt to counteract ours? I answer, she could, (among other conceivable things,) prohibit or lay prohibitory duties on her commodities to this country, and on ours to her, in our bottoms; and she might, in addition, temporarily grant the same privileges to Dutch or other friendly bottoms which are now granted to those of the United States in the trade between us and herself; or she might go no further in this particular than to permit the importation of our commodities in some of those bottoms. This, it is true, would be a departure from the system of her Navigation Act; but when the question was, whether she should surrender it permanently to us by extension, or temporarily to a Power more friendly to her, till the issue of the experiment could be decided, who can doubt what would be the course which interest and resentment would dictate?

But there are numerous other regulations which could be adopted, and which, equally with the foregoing, would have the effect of transferring the trade between the two countries to the management of some third party; for, after all, it is not improbable this will be the result of the contest, that, instead of the United States and Great Britain carrying on jointly as they now do the trade between the two countries, it will be carried on either directly or circuitously by some third Power, more to our detriment than to that of Great Britain.

The manufactures of that country will get to us nearly in the same quantities they now do, with the disadvantage of additional charges. Such of our commodities as she cannot have of equal quality elsewhere, will get to her also. The rest will be supplanted by the like commodities of other nations, and we shall lose the best market we have for them. Those who advocate the system of contention, should tell us where a substitute will be found. The merchants, who know that it is now difficult enough to find markets for our surplus commodities—that France, in ordinary times, affords a very contracted one, and that the French West Indies are not likely, in settled times, to be as good customers as they have been for some time past, cannot desire to see the sphere abridged, and our landholders will quickly reprobate the plan.

Thus, it appears, that the contest would be likely to issue against us, and to end in defeat and disgrace.

What would be our situation if we should make an attempt of the kind and fail in it? Our trade would then truly be in the power and at the disposal of Great Britain.

3d. The third ingredient stated, as necessary to justify the proposed attempt, is this: that the prospect of advantages should be at least an equivalent for those in possession, which would be put in jeopardy by the experiment.

It has been shown, that in fact there is no real prospect of advantage, but a considerable one of inconvenience and loss. This puts an end to comparison. But it may be added, that our situation is precisely such an one as to forbid experiments. It is so, from the stage at which we are, as a people, too little advanced, too little matured for hazardous experiments of any sort.

This is not all; our general situation at this time is an eligible one; we are making as rapid a progress in most of the great branches of political prosperity as we can reasonably desire, and it would be imprudent to hazard such a situation, upon precarious speculations of greater advantage. The prosperity of a nation is not a plant to thrive in a hot-bed; moderation in this respect is the truest wisdom; it is so plain a path, that it requires a peculiar sublimation of ideas to deviate from it.

It is agreed on all hands, that all our great national interests, our population, agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and our navigation, are in a thriving and progressive state, advancing faster than was to have been expected, and as fast as can reasonably be desired.

Our navigation, in the short space of three years, ending the 31st of December, 1792, has increased in the ratio of nearly one fifth.

The proportions of our tonnage have been as follows: In 1790, 479,091 tons; in 1791, 501,790 tons; in 1792, 568,283 tons; showing an increase of 89,192 tons.

The proportion of foreign tonnage during the same years, has been: in 1790, 258,919 tons; in 1791, 240,799 tons; in 1792, 244,263 tons; showing a decrease of 14,656 tons. This proves that our present system is highly favorable to the increase of our navigation, and that we are gradually supplanting foreigners.

The truth is, that the difference in the tonnage duty, and the addition of one-tenth upon the duties on goods imported in foreign bottoms, is a powerful encouragement to our shipping, and as it has not been of a magnitude to excite retaliation, it is much more likely to promote the interests of our navigation, than violent measures, which would compel to retaliation; prudence admonishes us to stop where we are, for the present, rather than risk the advantages we possess, in trials of strength, that never fail to injure more or less both parties.

If we turn from our shipping to our agriculture, we shall find no reason to be dissatisfied.

The amount of our exports for the year ending the 30th of September, 1792, as appears by the last return of exports to this House, exceeded the two preceding years by $589,601 16. It exceeded the mean of the two preceding years, by $1,597,983 86. Our revenues are unquestionably more productive than was looked for. Those from imports have exceeded, in a year, $4,600,000. Of the increase of our manufactures, we have no precise standard, but those who attend most to the subject entertain no doubt that they are progressive.

This certainly is not a state of things that invites to hazardous experiments. These are perhaps never justifiable, but when the affairs of a nation are in an unprosperous train.

We experience, indeed, some embarrassments from the effects of the European war, but these are temporary, and will cease with that war, which of itself offers us some indemnifications, I mean a freer trade to the West Indies.

I am greatly mistaken if the considerations, which have been suggested, do not conclusively prove the impolicy of the plan which is now recommended for our adoption. So strong and decided is my own conviction, that I cannot but persuade myself, that of the Committee will lead to its rejection. A few miscellaneous observations will conclude what I have to offer on this very interesting subject.

First. It has been made an objection to the present footing on which our trade is with Great Britain, that it is regulated by annual proclamation of the Executive, instead of a permanent law. This was at first laid down by the Secretary of State in terms so general as to include the West Indies; but he has since corrected the error, and told us that our trade with the British West Indies is regulated by a standing law. The fact itself, nevertheless, is of no real importance. The actual footing, on which we are placed, is of little consequential point; the mode of doing it is of little consequence. The annual proclamation of the British Executive is equivalent to the decree, revocable at pleasure, of any single Legislator, of the Monarch of Spain or Portugal, and it may be added, of the French Convention, which, though a numerous body, yet forming only one Assembly, without checks, is as liable to fluctuation as a single Legislator; and, in fact, its resolutions have been found as fickle and variable, as it was possible for the resolutions of any single person to be. To prove this, if proof were required, it would be only necessary to refer to the frequent changes in the regulations they have made with regard to the trade of this country—to-day one thing, to-morrow another. Instability is more applicable to no political institution than to a Legislature, consisting of a single popular Assembly.

Second. The additional duties proposed, are objectionable, because the existing duties are already, generally speaking, high enough for the state of our mercantile capital and the safety of collection. They are near twenty per centum on an average, upon the value of the objects on which they are laid; higher than the duties of several countries, and high enough for our present condition. To augment the rates materially will be in the abstract to oppress trade; for we must have for our consumption the manufactures of the country on which they are proposed to be laid.

Third. To serve as a contrast to the conduct of Great Britain, we are told of the liberal overtures for a commercial treaty lately made by France.

It has been already remarked that the conduct of France towards us since the commencement of the Revolution, is no basis of reasoning; it has undergone as many revolutions as their political systems; their measures at one period, with respect to our tobacco, were of a complexion peculiarly hostile to us. The duty of twenty-five livres per quintal on that article, carried in our bottoms to France, and of only eighteen livres fifteen sous on the same article, carried in French bottoms, amounted to a complete prohibition to carry our tobacco in our own bottoms.

The duty of twenty-five livres per quintal on foreign fish is another important instance of severity of regulations, a duty admitted by the Secretary of State to be prohibitory.

If there have been regulations and propositions of a more favorable nature, they are to be ascribed to causes of the moment. During the continuance of the Revolution, it is of necessity that we have carte blanche in the French West Indies. We know that we are getting admission into the British and Spanish Islands also.

And as the overtures for a permanent system, Mr. Genet's instructions, published by him, explain the object. Privileges of trade in the West India islands are to be the price of our becoming a party in the war. The declarations against the libertine maxims of the ancient Government, and in favor of free principles of commerce, resolve themselves into this. This is a bargain which I trust a majority of this House will not be willing to make. I am sure our constituents would not thank us for it.

But it may be asked, are we to sit with folded arms and tamely submit to all oppressions, restrictions, and exclusions to which our trade is subject; if not, what are we to do? I answer, nothing certainly at the present juncture. If the foundation of the question were more solid than I believe it to be, candidly and dispassionately considered, this is of all moments the most unfavorable for an experiment. Any movement of the kind would, as before observed, be construed into a political manœuvre and an attempt to embarrass one of the belligerent Powers, and would interest the feelings of all those united with her, producing consequently either war or additional trammels in every quarter upon our trade; besides the weighty argument, that the great source of subsidiary supply to which we might have heretofore looked has been obstructed.

But I answer further, that we ought with great caution to attempt any thing at a future day, till we have acquired a maturity which will enable us to act with greater effect, and to brave the consequences, even if they should amount to war, and till we have secured more adequate means of internal supply; to which point we should bend our efforts, as the only rational and safe expedient, in our present circumstances, for counteracting the effects of the spirit of monopoly, which more or less tinctures not the system of Great Britain merely, but that of all Europe. But this it seems is not the favorite course, it is not high seasoned enough for our political palate; we not only turn aside from it with neglect, but we object away the plainest provisions of the Constitution to disable ourselves from pursuing it.

Every year, for years to come, will make us a more important customer to Great Britain, and a more important furnisher of what she wants. If this does not lead to such a treaty of commerce as we desire, the period is not very distant when we may insist with much better effect on what we desire, without any thing like the same degree of hazard. This last observation is not meant to be confined to Great Britain, but to extend to any other Power, as far as the stipulations of treaty may permit.

Wisdom admonishes us to be patient, "to make haste slowly." Our progress is and will be rapid enough, if we do not throw away our advantages. Why should we be more susceptible than all the world? Why should this young country throw down the gauntlet in favor of free trade against the world? There may be spirit in it, but there will certainly not be prudence.

But again it may be asked, shall we put nations, disposed to a more liberal system, upon the same footing with those differently disposed? Will not this tend to produce an unfriendly treatment from all?

I answer, first, that I think it has been proved, the nation against which we have been invited principally to aim our artillery, treats us with at least as much liberality as other nations, I mean in a commercial sense.

I answer, secondly, that if there be nations, who are seriously disposed to establish with us more free and beneficial principles of trade, the path is plain; let treaties be formed, fixing upon a solid basis the privileges which we are to enjoy, and the equivalent. I have no objection to granting greater privileges to one Power than to another, if it can be put on a stable foundation of contract, ascertaining the boon and the equivalent. But I think it folly to be granting voluntary boons at the expense of the United States without equivalent. The mode of treaty secures the ground; it is inoffensive to any third Power. Our reply to objections would in that case be, "here is the price to us clearly defined and fixed by treaty, for which we grant the greater advantages of which you complain: give us the price, and the like advantages are yours." But capriciously to grant greater privileges by law to one nation than to another, when, upon a fair comparison, we are not better treated by one than by another, is neither equitable, politic, nor safe.

Let us then leave changes for the present to the course of national treaties, and continue to proceed in the path in which we have hitherto found prosperity and safety.

When Mr. Sumn had concluded, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 14.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries; when Mr. Madison rose in reply to Mr. Sumn, of South Carolina.

Mr. M. began by observing that he had expected, from what was intimated yesterday, the sequel of what was then said against the resolutions before the Committee; but, as there was a silence in that quarter, and no other member has risen on either side of the question, he himself would request the attention of the Committee.

It had been much pressed that, in the discussion of this subject, it should be viewed in its commercial relations only. He was perfectly willing to meet every objection that could be urged on that ground; but, as he conceived it impossible to do full justice to the interests of the United States without taking some collateral considerations into view, he should be obliged, in the course of his remarks, to point at the political disposition and conduct of some of the nations of Europe towards this country.

The propositions immediately before the Committee turned on the question, whether any thing ought to be done at this time, in the way of commercial regulations, towards vindicating and advancing our national interests. Perhaps it might be made a question with some, whether, in any case, Legislative regulations of commerce were consistent with its nature and prosperity.

He professed himself to be a friend to the theory which gives to industry a free course, under the impulse of individual interest and the guidance of individual sagacity. He was persuaded that it would be happy for all nations, if the barriers erected by prejudice, by avarice, and by despotism, were broken down, and a free intercourse established among them. Yet to this, as to all other general rules, there might be exceptions; and the rule itself required what did not exist—that it should be general.

To illustrate this observation, he referred to the Navigation Act of Great Britain, which, not being counterbalanced by any similar acts on the part of rival nations, had secured to Great Britain no less than eleven-twelfths of the shipping and seamen employed in her trade. It is stated that, in 1660, when the British act passed, the foreign tonnage was to the British, as one to four; in 1700, less than one to six; in 1725, as one to nineteen; in 1750, as one to twelve; in 1774, nearly the same. At the commencement of the period, the tonnage was but 95,266 tons; at the end of it, 1,136,162.

As another illustration, he mentioned the case where two countries happened to be in such a relation to each other, that the one, by discouraging the manufactures of the other, might not only invigorate its own, but transplant the manufacturers themselves. Here the gain would be a clear one, and the effect evidently consistent with the principle of the theory.

To allow trade to regulate itself is not, therefore, to be admitted as a maxim universally sound. Our own experience has taught us that, in certain cases, it is the same thing with allowing one nation to regulate it for another. Were the United States, in fact, in commercial intercourse with one nation only, and to oppose no restrictions whatever to a system of foreign restrictions, they would, of necessity, be deprived of all share in the carriage, although their vessels might be able to do it cheapest, as well as of the only resources for defence on that side where they must always be most exposed to attack. A small burden only in foreign ports on American vessels, and a perfect equality of foreign vessels, with our own in our own ports, would gradually banish the latter altogether.

The subject, as had been remarked on a former occasion, was not an ovel one; it was coeval with our political birth, and has at all times exercised the thoughts of reflecting citizens. As early as the year succeeding the peace, the effect of the foreign policy, which began to be felt in our trade and navigation, excited universal attention and inquietude. The first effort thought of was an application of Congress to the States for a grant of power for a limited time, to regulate our foreign commerce, with a view to control the influence of unfavorable regulations in some cases, and to conciliate an extension of favorable ones in others. From some circumstances then incident to our situation, and particularly from a radical vice in the then political system of the United States, the experiment did not take effect.

The States next endeavored to effect their purpose by separate but concurrent regulations. Massachusetts opened a correspondence with Virginia and other States, in order to bring about the plan. Here, again, the effort was abortive.

Out of this experience grew the measures which terminated in the establishment of a Government competent to the regulation of our commercial interests and the vindication of our commercial rights.

As these were the first objects of the people in the steps taken for establishing the present Government, they were universally expected to be among the first fruits of its operation. In this expectation, the public were disappointed. An attempt was made in different forms, and received the repeated sanction of this branch of the Legislature, but they expired in the Senate—not, indeed, as was alleged, from a dislike to the attempt altogether, but the modifications given to it. It has not appeared, however, that it was ever renewed in a different form in that House, and for some time it has been allowed to sleep in both.

If the reasons which originally prevailed against measures such as those now proposed had weight in them, they can no longer furnish a pretext for opposition.

When the subject was discussed in the first Congress, at New York, it was said that we ought to try the effect of a generous policy towards Great Britain; that we ought to give time for negotiating a treaty of commerce; that we ought to await the close of negotiations for explaining and executing the Treaty of Peace. We have now waited a term of more than four years. The Treaty of Peace remains unexecuted on her part, though all pretext for delay has been removed by the steps taken on ours; no treaty of commerce is either in train or in prospect; instead of relaxations in former articles complained of, we suffer new and aggravated violations of our rights.

In the view which he took of the subject, he called the attention of the Committee particularly to the subject of navigation, of manufactures, and of the discrimination proposed in the motion between some nations and others.

On the subject of navigation, he observed that we were prohibited by the British laws from carrying to Great Britain the produce of other countries from their ports, or our own produce from the ports of other countries, or the produce of other countries from our own ports, or to send our own produce from our own or other ports in the vessels of other countries. This last restriction was, he observed, felt by the United States at the present moment. It was, indeed, the practice of Great Britain, sometimes to relax her Navigation Act so far, in time of war, as to permit to neutral vessels a circuitous carriage; but, as yet, the act was in full force against the use of them for transporting the produce of the United States.

On the other hand, the laws of the United States allowed Great Britain to bring into their ports anything she might please, from her own or from other ports, and in her own or in other vessels.

In the trade between the United States and the British West Indies, the vessels of the former were under an absolute prohibition, whilst British vessels in that trade enjoyed all the privileges granted to other, even the most favored nations, in their trade with us. The inequality in this case was the more striking, as it was evident that the West Indies were dependent on the United States for the supplies essential to them, and that the circumstances which secured to the United States this advantage, enabled their vessels to transport the supplies on far better terms than could be done by British vessels.

To illustrate the policy requisite in our commercial intercourse with other nations, he presented a comparative view of the American and foreign tonnage employed in the respective branches of it, from which it appeared that the foreign stood to the American as follows: Spain, 1 to 5; Portugal, 1 to 6; the United Netherlands, 1 to 15; Denmark, 1 to 12; Russia, — to —; France, 1 to 5; Great Britain, 5 to 1.

It results from these facts, that, in proportion as the trade might be diminished with Great Britain and increased with other nations, would be the probable increase of the American tonnage. It appeared, for example, that, as the trade might pass from British channels into those of France, it would augment our tonnage at the rate of 10 to 1.

The above calculation, he said, had been made out on the documents of 1790, and on the amount of the tonnage entered in the several ports. A document stating the amounts of the actual tonnage in the American trade had just been reported to that House. If this, which was liable to some remarks that might hereafter be made, was to be substituted, it afforded another calculation, diminishing the excess in favor of Great Britain, but augmenting it in favor of the United States in most of the other instances.

According to this calculation, the foreign to the American tonnage might be stated as follows: Spain, 1 to 16; Portugal, 1 to 17; United Netherlands, 1 to 26; Denmark, 1 to 15; Russia, 1 to 14; France, 1 to between 4 and 5; Great Britain, nearly as 3 to 1.

Such a disproportion, taking even the reduced one, in the navigation with Great Britain, was the more mortifying, when the nature and amount of our exports are considered. Our exports are not only, for the most part, either immediately necessities of life, or ultimately as necessities to manufacturers, and must thence command a sure market wherever they are received at all, but the peculiar bulkiness of them furnishes an advantage over the exports of every other country, and particularly over those of Great Britain. If such an advantage belonged to that nation, the policy which governs her navigation laws would probably have given the exclusive carriage to her own bottoms. It is equally in our power, if so selfish a principle should be forced upon us, to secure to our bottoms the same monopoly, leaving to other nations with which we trade the like exclusive carriage of their exports. The regulation would, to be sure, be mutually inconvenient; and, by forcing the vessels of each party to return empty from foreign markets, be so far a tax on the intercourse. This effect, however, did not disprove the power us over the carriage of them, nor lessen the argument drawn from it. Examine it in relation to Great Britain. The bulk of her exports to us, compared with that of ours to her, is as nothing. An inconsiderable quantity of shipping would suffice for her, whilst ours can load about 222,000 tons. Including the articles she exports from the West Indies to this country, they bear no proportion to ours. Yet, in the entire trade between the United States and the British Dominions, her tonnage is to that of the United States as 156,000, employing 9,360 seamen, to 66,000, employing 3,690 seamen. Were a rigid exertion of our right to take place, it would extend our tonnage to 222,000, and leave to Great Britain employment for much less than the actual share now enjoyed by the United States. It could not be wished to push matters to this extremity. It showed, however, the very unequal and unfavorable footing on which the carrying trade, the great resource of our safety and respectability, was placed by foreign regulations, and the reasonableness of peaceable attempts to meliorate it. We might, at least, in availing ourselves of the merit of our exports, contend for such regulations as would reverse the proportion, and give the United States the 156,000 tonnage and 9,360 seamen, instead of the 66,000 tonnage and 3,690 seamen.

He here adverted to the discount of ten per cent. on the duties paid by goods imported in American bottoms, remarking that it was not founded on the true policy of encouraging our shipping. It was not the imports, but the exports, that regulated the quantity of tonnage. What was imported in American vessels, which would otherwise return empty, was, no doubt, a benefit to the American merchant, but could slightly only, if at all, increase the mass of our tonnage. The way to effect this was to secure exportations to American bottoms.

Proceeding to the subject of manufactures, he observed that it presented no compensations for the inequalities in the principles and effects of the navigation system.

We consume British manufactures to double the amount of what Britain takes from us, and quadruple the amount of what she actually consumes.

We take everything after it has undergone all the profitable labor that can be bestowed on it. She receives, in return, raw materials, the food of her industry. We send necessities to her. She sends superfluities to us. We admit everything she pleases to send us, whether of her own or alien production. She refuses not only our manufactures, but the articles we wish most to send her—our wheat and flour, our fish, and our salted provisions. These constitute our best staples for exportation, as her manufactures constitute hers. It appeared, by an authentic document he had examined, that of the manufactured articles imported in 1790, amounting to $15,295,638 97, we received from and through Great Britain $13,965,464 95. During the same year the manufactures imported from France, the next great commercial country, and consuming more of our produce than Great Britain, amounted to no more than $155,136 63. To give a fuller view of our foreign commerce, he stated the balances with the several nations of Europe and their dominions, as follow: Spain, $1,670,797 in favor of the United States; Portugal, $1,687,699 in favor of the United States; United Netherlands, $791,118 in favor of the United States; Sweden, $32,965 in favor of the United States; Denmark, $126,949 against the United States; France, $2,630,987 in favor of the United States; Great Britain, $5,922,012 against the United States. This enormous balance to Great Britain is on the exports to her. On her consumption the balance is still greater, amounting to nine or ten millions; to which again is to be added her profits on the re-exports in a manufactured and raw state. It might be said that an unfavorable balance was no proof of an unfavorable trade; that the only important balance was the ultimate one on our aggregate commerce. That there was much truth in this general doctrine was admitted; at the same time it was equally certain that there were exceptions to it, some of which were conceived to be applicable to the situation of the United States. But whether the doctrine were just or not, as applied to the United States, it was well known that the reasoning and practice of other countries were governed by a contrary doctrine. In all of them an unfavorable balance, to be paid in specie, was considered as an evil. Great Britain, in particular, had always studied to prevent it as much as she could. What, then, may be the effect on the policy of a nation with which we have the most friendly and beneficial relations, when it sees the balance of trade with us not only so much against her, but all the specie that pays it flowing immediately into the lap of her greatest rival, if not her most inveterate enemy. As to the discrimination proposed between nations having and not having commercial treaties with us, the principle was embraced by the laws of most, if not all the States, while the regulation of trade was in their hands. It had the repeated sanction of votes in the House of Representatives, during the session of the present Government at New York. It has been practised by other nations, and in a late instance against the United States. It tends to procure beneficial treaties from those who refuse them, by making them the price of enjoying an equality with other nations in our commerce. It tends, as a conciliatory preference, to procure better treaties from those who have not refused them. It was a prudent consideration, in dispensing commercial advantages, to favor rather those whose friendship and support may be expected in case of necessity, than those whose disposition wore a contrary aspect. He did not wish to enter at present, nor at all, if unnecessary, into a display of the unfriendly features which marked the policy of Great Britain towards the United States. He should be content to lay aside, at least for the present, the subject of the Indians, the Algerines, the spoliations, &c.; but he could not forbear remarking generally, that if that, or any other nation were known to bear us a settled ill will, nothing could be more impolitic than to foster resources which would be more likely to be turned against us than exerted in our favor. It had been admitted, by the gentleman who spoke yesterday, [Mr. Smith, of South Carolina,] to be a misfortune that our trade should be so far engrossed by any one nation as it is in the hands of Great Britain. But the gentleman added nothing to alleviate the misfortune, when he advised us to make no efforts for putting an end to it. The evils resulting from such a state of things were as serious as they were numerous. To say nothing of sudden derangements, from the caprice with which Sovereigns might be seized, there were casualties which might not be avoidable. A general bankruptcy, which was a possible event in a nation with which we were so connected, would reverberate upon us with a most dreadful shock. A partial bankruptcy had actually and lately taken place, and was severely felt in our commerce. War is a common event, particularly to Great Britain, and involves us in the embarrassments it brings on our commerce, whilst ours is so disproportionate to our interwoven with it. Add the influence that may be conveyed into the public councils by a nation directing the course of our trade by her capital, and holding so great a share in our pecuniary institutions, and the effect that may finally ensue on our taste, our manners, and our form of Government itself. If the question be asked, What might be the consequence of counter efforts, and whether this attempt to vindicate our public interests would not produce them? his answer was, that he did not in the least apprehend such a consequence, as well because the measure afforded no pretext, being short of what was already done by Great Britain in her commercial system, as because she would be the greatest sufferer from a stagnation of the trade between the two countries if we should force on such a crisis. Her merchants would feel it. Her navigation would feel it. Her manufactures would feel it. Her West Indies would be ruined by it. Her revenue would deeply feel it. And her Government would feel it through every nerve of its operations. We, too, should suffer in some respects, but in a less degree; and, if the virtue and temper of our fellow-citizens were not mistaken, the experiment would flad in them a far greater readiness to bear it. It was clear to him, therefore, that if Great Britain should contrary to all the rules of probability, stop the commerce between the two countries, the issue would be a complete triumph to the United States. He dwelt particularly on the dependence of British manufactures on the market of the United States. He referred to a paper in Anderson's History of Commerce, which states the amount of British manufactures at £51,310,000 sterling, and the number of souls employed in, and supported by them, at 5,250,000. Supposing the United States to consume two and a half millions of British manufactures, which is a moderate estimate, the loss of their market would deprive of subsistence 250,000 souls. Add 50,000, who depend for employment on our raw materials: here are 300,000 souls who live by our custom. Let them be driven to poverty and despair by acts of their own Government, and what would be the consequence? Most probably an acquisition of so many useful citizens to the United States, which form the natural asylum against the distresses of Europe. But whether they should remain in discontent and wretchedness in their own country, or seek their fortunes in another, the evil would be felt by the British Government as equally great, and be avoided with equal caution.

It might be regarded (he observed) as a general rule, that, where one nation consumed the necessities of life produced by another, the consuming nation was dependent on the producing one. On the other hand, where the consumption consisted of superfluities, the producing nation was dependent on the consuming one. The United States were in the fortunate situation of enjoying both these advantages over Great Britain. They supply a part of her dominions with the necessities of life; they consume superfluities which give bread to her people in another part. Great Britain, therefore, is under a double dependence on the commerce of the United States. She depends on them for what she herself consumes; she depends on them for what they consume. In proportion as a nation manufactures luxuries must be its disadvantage in contests of every sort with its customers. The reason is obvious. What is a luxury to the consumer is a necessary to the manufacturer. By changing a fashion or appointing a fancy only, bread may be taken from the mouths of thousands whose industry is devoted to the gratification of artificial wants. He mentioned the case of a petition from a great body of buckle makers, presented a few years ago to the Prince of Wales, complaining of the use of strings instead of buckles in the shoes, and supplicating his Royal Highness, as giving the law to fashions, to save them from want and misery by discontinuing the new one. It was not (he observed) the Prince who petitioned the manufacturers to continue to make the buckles, but the manufacturers who petitioned their customer to buy them. The relation was similar between the American customers and the British manufacturers; and if a law were to pass for putting a stop to the use of their superfluities, or a stop were otherwise to be put to it, it would quickly be seen from which the distress and supplications would flow. Suppose that Great Britain received from us alone the whole of the necessities she consumes, and that our market alone took off the luxuries with which she paid for them: here the dependence would be complete, and we might impose whatever terms we please on the exchange. This, to be sure, is not absolutely the case; but, in proportion as it is the case, her dependence is on us. The West Indies, however, are an example of complete dependence. They cannot subsist without our food. They cannot flourish without our lumber and our use of their rum. On the other hand, we depend on them for not a single necessary, and can supply ourselves with their luxuries from other sources. Sugar is the only article about which there was ever a question; and he was authorized to say that there was not, at the most, one-sixth of our consumption supplied from the British islands. In time of war or famine the dependence of the West Indies is felt in all its energy. It is sometimes such as to appeal to our humanity as well as our interest for relief. At this moment the Governor of Jamaica is making proclamation of their distresses. If ever, therefore, there was a case where one country could dictate to another the regulation of trade between them, it is the case of the United States and the British West Indies. And yet the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] had considered it as a favor that we were allowed to send our provisions in British bottoms, and in these only, to the West Indies. The favor, reduced to plain language, in the mouth of their planters, would run thus: We will agree to buy your provisions rather than starve, and let you have our rum, which we can sell nowhere else; but we reserve out of this indulgence a monopoly of the carriage to British vessels. With regard to revenue, the British resources were extremely exhausted, in comparison with those of the United States. The people of Great Britain were taxed at the rate of 40 shillings a head, the people of the United States at not more than 6 shillings a head—less than one-sixth of the British tax. As the price of labor, which pays the tax, is double in the United States to what it is in Great Britain, the burden on Americans citizens is less than one-twelfth of the burden on British subjects. It is true, indeed, that Britain alone does not bear the whole burden. She levies indirect taxes on her West Indies and on her East Indies, and derives, from an acquiescence in her monopolizing regulations, an imperceptible tribute from the whole commercial world. Still, however, the difference of burden in the two countries is immense. Britain has, moreover, great arrears of unfunded debts. She is threatened with defects in her revenue, even at this time. She is engaged in an expensive war, and she raises the supplies for it on the most expensive terms. Add to the whole, that her population is stationary, if not diminishing, whilst that of the United States is in a course of increase beyond example. Should it still be asked whether the impost might not be affected, and how a deficiency might be supplied, he thought sufficient answers might be given. He took for granted that the articles subjected to the additional duties would continue to come according to the demand for them; and believed, if the duties were prudently adjusted, the increase of importation would balance the decrease of importation. Our country is able to import, and probably will import, in proportion to our exports. Our exports amount, say, to twenty millions of dollars. If we import less from one country, we shall import more from another. If we import less of some things, we shall import more of other things; and according to our imports will be our revenue. Suppose Great Britain to make the rash and improbable experiment of prohibiting all commerce with the United States. She does not consume more than one-fourth of our exports, and we derive, perhaps, nearly half of our revenue from the productions of other countries. In this point of view, we should, at the worst, have three-fourths of our exports to pay for our reduced imports, and consequently a balance of about five millions of specie flowing into our country. The faculty which this would give to operations of revenue together with the consideration that the labor employed on one-fourth of our ordinary exports would be employed for internal purposes, might assure us that a judicious Government would easily be able to provide the means of supplying the deficiency of impost.

But it was superfluous to enter into calculations of this sort. He recurrd to the utter improbability that such a contingency should happen. He was fully persuaded that the resolutions, if agreed to, would not impair the revenue.

It is objected, that Spain and Portugal, who are good customers to us, and the latter particularly friendly, having no commercial treaty with us, will come within the operation of the resolutions.

Several answers may be given to this objection.

1. They do not manufacture the articles in question, so as to be sensibly affected.

2. They employ but little tonnage in our trade: Spain, 2,689 tons only; Portugal, 2,340 tons only. They are supposed to be little anxious to increase the foreign branches of their carrying trade, being content with the internal trade carried on with their own dominions. As they have no Navigation Act within the purview of the resolutions, they would not be exposed to the retaliating clauses on that subject.

3. If friendly, they can be admitted to treaty on equitable conditions whenever they please.

4. They can easily be excepted, if thought expedient, either by a general proviso that the resolutions shall not extend to nations having no Navigation Act such as is therein described, or by providing that they shall not extend to countries south of Cape Finisterre, a distinction familiar to the British Statute Book.

It is said that Great Britain treats the United States as well as she treats other nations, and, therefore, they ought to be satisfied.

If other nations were willing to bear unequal regulations, or unable to vindicate their rights, it was no example for us.

But is it true that the same degree of reciprocity subsists between the United States and Great Britain, as between Great Britain and other countries? He did not admit this to be the case. Where treaties existed, they stipulated, in many instances, mutual and equal conditions of intercourse. He gave an example in the treaty of Methuen, in which the admission of British woollens by Portugal was balanced by the admission of Portuguese wine by Great Britain. The treaty with France, of late date, was another example, where a variety of reciprocal privileges and countervailing duties existed, or where they were silent, there were often legal regulations reciprocating the regulations of Great Britain. He referred to the laws of Sweden and Denmark, on the subject of manufactures, as instances.

It is said Great Britain treats us as well as other nations treat us. What nation, he asked, had such a Navigation Act? What nation besides excludes us from a circuitous trade? What nation excludes us from carrying our own commodities in our own bottoms, where the carriage is allowed to her bottoms?

It is said, that at least Great Britain treats us as well as we are treated by France, who will be favored by the resolutions. This point was particularly labored yesterday by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Smith,] who made a comparison of those two countries the principal basis of the discussion. As they were, in fact, the two countries which stood in the most important relations to the United States, the subject required a pretty accurate view of their respective dispositions, regulations, and intercourse, with this country.

should rely on the patience of the Committee in reading the observations and calculations to which he alluded. He here read the following note at the end of that report:

"That the encouragement of our carrying business is interesting, not only to the carrying States, but in a high degree also to the others, will result from the following facts:

The whole exports of the United States may be stated at - - - $25,000,000

Great Britain carries two-fifths of these in value, that is to say - - - 10,000,000

Freight and insurance on this, in times of peace, are about twenty-two and one-half per cent. - - - 2,250,000

The same charges in war are very various, according to the circumstances of the war; we may say, however, fifty-five per cent. - - - 5,500,000

The difference between peace and war freight and insurance, then, is annually - - - 3,250,000

Taxed on our agriculture by British wars, during their continuance, and our dependence on British bottoms.

Of the last one hundred years, Great Britain has had forty-two years of war and fifty-eight of peace, which is three of war to every four of peace, nearly, as shown in the following table:

PEACE		PERIODS OF TIME		WAR
Years.	Months.	Years.	Months.	Years.	Months.
4	8	1759, May - 1767, September	8	4
6	4	1767, May - 1772, August	10	3
5	8	1772, August - 1781, June	9	6
12	4	1781, June - 1793, May	12	2
7	0	1793, May - 1795, June	2	7
15	7	1795, June - 1802, November	7	5
6	2	1802, November - 1809, March	6	9
57	9	1809, March - 1815, May	6	0

In every term of seven years, then, we pay three times three million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or nine million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which, averaged on the years of peace and war, are annually and constantly one million three hundred and ninety-two thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven more than we should, if we could raise our own shipping, to be competent to the carriage of all our productions. Besides this, many of our bulky articles, not bearing a war freight, cannot be exported if exposed to that; so that their total loss is to be added to that before estimated."

This was a demonstration of the interest the United States had, particularly the Southern States, in obtaining an independent transportation for their commodities; and the effect of the present war, to which Britain is a party, in depriving them of the ordinary foreign resource, is bringing the evidence home to their feelings at the present moment.

It had been asked, what ground there was for concluding that Great Britain would be led, by the measures proposed, to change her policy towards the United States. He thought we had the best ground for relying on such an effect.

It is well known that, when she apprehended such measures would be taken, she manifested a readiness to admit a greater reciprocity into the commerce between the two countries. A bill for the purpose was brought into the House of Commons by the present Minister, Mr. Pitt, and would probably have passed into a law, if hopes had not sprung up that they should be able to maintain their exclusive system. Knox, an under Secretary, appears, from a collection of papers published by him, to have been the chief adviser in the Cabinet, as Lord Sheffield was the great champion before the public of this experiment. It was founded, according to both these witnesses, on a belief, 1st, that Nova Scotia and Canada would soon be able to feed the West Indies, and thereby make them independent of supplies from the United States. 2d, That the General Government was so feeble that it could not execute a plan of retarding restriction; and, 3d, That local interests and prejudices predominated so much among the States, that they would never even agree in making an attempt.

It is now thoroughly understood and admitted by the most biassed judges, that the British Continental Colonies cannot supply the Islands; that, as well as the Islands, they depend frequently for essential supplies on the United States. This calculation, therefore, has failed Great Britain.

The next has been completely destroyed by the change of our former frail Confederacy into a Government which is found to be adequate to all its national objects. This hope has, therefore, in like manner failed.

The only remaining hope that can induce Great Britain to persevere in the plan of conduct she has adopted towards the United States lies in the supposed difficulty of reconciling their different interests and local prejudices. The present occasion will decide whether this hope, also, shall be withdrawn from her; or whether she is to be inspired with fresh confidence in pursuing her own interests, without a due respect either for our interests or for our rights.

He could not but view the present as, perhaps, the final chance of combining the opinions and interests of the several quarters of the Union in some proper and adequate plan. If, at a moment when so many occurrences conspire to unite the public councils, when the public mind is so well disposed to second all equitable and peaceable means of doing justice to our country, and when our commerce is so critically important to the vital resources of Great Britain, it should be found that nothing can be done, he could foresee no circumstances under which success was to be expected. To reject the propositions, therefore, whilst nothing better was substituted, must convey the most unfavorable impressions of our national character, and rivet the fetters on our commerce, as well as prolong other causes which had produced such injurious consequences to our country. He would not permit himself to apprehend that such would be the event of the deliberations of the Committee.

When Mr. MADISON had concluded, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 15.

A petition of Lieutenant Colonel Tousard was presented to the House and read, praying that such a sum of money may be paid him, in lieu of the pension during life, granted by a resolution of the late Congress, as may be deemed equitable and proper.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. LEARNED; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of Philip Audebert and others, clerks in the War Office, was presented to the House and read, stating the insufficiency of the salaries allowed them by law, and praying that the same may be augmented and rendered more adequate to their services.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. MADISON, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. GRIFFIN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution proposing to the several States the following article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to wit: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State," to which resolution they desire the concurrence of this House, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

The said resolution was read the first time.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, as being connected with the correspondence already in your possession, between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, the copy of a letter from that Minister, of the 25th of December, 1793; and a copy of the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, January 15, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUNDIN, from the committee appointed to examine the Laws of the United States, and report to the House such as have expired, or will expire before the next session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Ephraim Kimberly, which was made on the 18th of February last; and, the same being read, Ordered, That the said report be referred to Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. ORR, and Mr. SMITH, with instructions to prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant thereto.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A proposition being made to go into a Committee of the Whole on Mr. MADISON's resolutions—

Mr. AMES wanted to have the printed state of the negotiation between Great Britain and the Federal Government respecting a Treaty of Commerce; and likewise a paper from the Secretary of State, which the House had ordered to be got ready and printed some days ago. He wished gentlemen not to be in a hurry in deciding on a subject of such prodigious consequence as these propositions. He wished to defer going into a Committee until the papers could be had.

Mr. MADISON said, that it was somewhat singular that an objection should be made to the going into a Committee for the want of these papers. This want ought to have been stated on Monday. As to the idea of a friendly disposition on the part of Britain for entering into a Treaty of Commerce, he was convinced that Britain had no disposition that way. This he inferred from some passages in the Speech of the PRESIDENT, which were, at his desire, read by the Clerk. He trusted that the House would not hesitate in resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole immediately in order to discuss the propositions.

Mr. AMES thought it requisite to have the papers laid before the Committee which had been directed to be printed. He said there never had been an instance of any subject of the kind being pushed forward as the present. Such was the vastness and complexity of the evidence, and some parts of it were so obscure, that it was impossible for the House to have yet found leisure for embracing a well-founded opinion. The gentleman who spoke last had said that the papers called for could be of no consequence in discussing the resolutions. This assertion was in itself a very proper reason for printing the papers, that the gentleman, by having an opportunity of reading them, might be convinced of their importance. Mr. A. said that he believed there was an amicable disposition on the part of Britain. He grounded his assertion on an acknowledgment that had been made some time ago by one of the British Ministers, in Parliament, who said, that he expected soon to lay before that House a Commercial Treaty between England and America. The gentleman had said that we should found our measures on the dispositions of the several Powers of Europe toward us. That was right. But it was requisite to be informed of those dispositions before forming these resolutions.

The House then went into Committee.

Mr. FORREST, after a long pause, observed, that as no other person appeared disposed to rise on the occasion, although he felt himself unequal to doing that justice to the subject which many others were, yet he considered it his duty to offer a few remarks which had occurred to him in the course of the debate.

In all our discussions of commercial affairs, the principal point to be kept in view was the promotion of the essential and permanent interests of our country, keeping in mind this maxim (as true in respect to nations as individuals,) that there is no friendship in trade. He then entered into a consideration of our commercial connexion with Great Britain, and observed, that we should avoid letting our former prejudices, or those arising from recent transactions, influence our judgments. We should not regard the favoring of the French or British nation, but study to do that which would tend to the promotion of our own commerce and the interest of our own navigation. In this pursuit, we must keep in view our relative situation with European nations, particularly those of France and Great Britain, and more particularly the latter, with whom the proposed resolutions contemplate a change. Of all possible times, (said he,) I believe this the most improper to try the experiment.

If the British Government have been instrumental in letting the Algerines loose upon us; if their privateers commit acts of piracy upon our neutral flag, let it at least, in the first instance, be made matter of negotiation. Neutral nations must suffer some inconvenience; and it will be much better policy to come forward at once and say we are at war. We will not submit to vexatious insults, when they are too much to suffer, rather than make this commercial warfare, by which it is impossible, in the course of human events, but that we must be much the greatest sufferers; and how humiliating would it be, after trial, even to propose to make it a drawn battle!

Let us examine the subject. Of the whole fair trade of Great Britain, taking their imports and exports into view, their trade with the United States will be found to be one-sixth, or thereabouts. Take the imports and exports of the United States, and you will find that full one-half the value of our whole trade is with Great Britain and her dependencies. Who will suffer most? She, by the interruption of one-sixth, with the means of getting most of the articles we supply, on as good terms, from other nations, with great internal sources of revenue, and a people used to bear any taxes asked of them; or we, with an interruption of one-half our trade and commerce, not so well off with respect to internal resources, and the complaints of our citizens, not accustomed to heavy taxation? Let those who rely upon the effect it will have on the English manufacturers and artisans, look back to 1773 and 1774, and recollect the effect it then had.

But there is one circumstance that should have weight with every mind. It will be found that three-fourths of all the import revenue of this country is derived from our commerce with the British. Shall we hazard an entire loss of this opinion that the first resolution was by far too indefinite. The substance of the whole arguments advanced on both sides tended only to establish a fact, which was already perfectly well known, that the Governments of Europe act, in regard to the commerce of the United States, just as they think proper. The lesson was a very good one, and he trusted that, with a proper attention to temporary circumstances, this country would improve by it.

Mr. MADISON regarded the objection of the gentleman as entirely of a new kind. He had refused his consent to the first of the resolutions, because it was indefinite. But the propositions laid before the House a few days ago with respect to the Algerines were fully as indefinite, and yet the gentleman who spoke last had recommended them. The order of proceedings in the present question is perfectly candid and regular, consonant to the practice of the House and the practice of the gentleman himself.

Mr. S. SMITH, after a few introductory observations, said, the object of the resolution is, to lay an extra duty on goods from Powers not in treaty with the United States. These duties will operate as a bounty, say, for calculation, of five per cent., in favor of those Powers with whom we have a treaty of commerce; for experience has shown that those nations cannot supply us on terms so favorable as that with whom no treaty exists. It is a subject, then, of fair inquiry, what advantages we enjoy from those nations we are in treaty with, to induce us to grant them such bounty; and what are the disadvantages which result from those treaties?

The United States have a commercial treaty with France, Holland, Prussia, and Sweden. What are the commercial advantages? The advantages in the treaties most useful to us are, that free ships make free goods; and this is to be reciprocal. We have seen that this stipulation has been violated whenever the necessity of the case, in their opinion, made it useful to France. The disadvantages of those treaties are, their prizes coming into our ports, and their armed vessels cruising on our coasts. It appears, then, that we have no advantages given us by those treaties sufficient to induce us to lay a tax of five per cent. on $17,000,000 of importations, from Powers not in treaty with us, say $850,000 per annum, to act as a bounty on the manufactures of the nations in treaty.

It then becomes a subject of inquiry, what injuries have we received from the Powers with whom we have no commercial treaty, that should induce us to tax ourselves $850,000 per annum to retaliate on them? These Powers are Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Russia, Hamburg, Bremen, and the other Hanse Towns, and Great Britain.

Spain has laid a heavy duty on our flour, to encourage her own; but not more than on that of other nations. She has also undertaken, in alliance with Great Britain, to prevent our taking our produce to France, contrary to the custom in former wars. It is true, the same two Powers attempted the same thing on a former occasion.

Spain has, by a late edict, granted to nations in treaty of commerce, license to trade in Louisiana, Florida, &c., &c., which immediately excludes us, and this may be of serious consequence. The English will introduce a good market for tobacco there; perhaps they may think it their interest to reduce the duty on that article, now 3s. 6d. per pound, to the same with ours, which is 1s. 3d.; or, if we pass these resolutions, make ours 3s. 6d., and theirs 1s. 3d. But Spain takes almost all their flour, a great quantity of wheat, corn, and lumber, beef, pork, fish, rice, &c., &c., from us, and is our very best customer. She supplies us with dollars, brandy, wine, fruits, salt, and silk goods, on fair terms. Some of these are articles which cannot be procured from the Powers in treaty, and ought we to offend her, to gratify our resentment against England?

Portugal refuses, since our Revolution, to take our flour. In every other respect she is among our best friends. She receives our wheat, corn, lumber, and many other articles; her late conduct calls for our sincerest gratitude. She supplies us with wine, salt, some East India goods, lemons, &c., &c. Why should we declare commercial war against such a friend?

The immediate relations with Denmark are increasing daily, and on fair terms. In her islands, we have the fairest intercourse. Our flour, meal, corn, lumber, beef, beef, pork, and fish, are received there in our own bottoms, and we bring from thence all their produce. Their children are educated among us, form friendships, and matrimonial connexions. Why should we declare a commercial war against a Power so friendly?

Russia affords us iron, hemp, sail-duck, sheet-ings; and some other articles; admits us into her ports on fair terms, and leaves to us the whole carrying trade between the two countries. What cause have we to tax her commodities? She has done nothing to offend us, seems well disposed, and many of her articles can be had nowhere else; and it ought to be considered, she can support the armed neutrality.

Hamburg and Bremen receive our vessels with every possible mark of friendship; they take great quantities of tobacco, rice, deerskins, furs, and a surplus of our imports from the West India; they supply us with glass, German osnaburges, and other German linens, on much better terms than any other country. What injury have those Republics done us, that we should throw their trade into the lap of Holland, where we generally pay five to ten per cent. more than we pay in those ports?

I come now (said Mr. S.) to the great stumbling block, Great Britain, against whom these resolutions point, and whose political conduct has been the fruitful topic of so much declamation. He concurred in opinion with those who had severely reprobated the conduct of their piratical privateers towards our navigation; but are these good reasons, said he, why we should commence a commercial war with more than one half the European nations, or even with her, unless we shall find it greatly to our interest? Alterations of commercial systems require time and much delicacy in effecting. We do not at present know what will be the result of proper remonstrances against the injuries we have suffered. Has Great Britain laid any restrictions on our commerce which are not similar to those she lays on other foreign nations? I believe not. Have we any advantages in her ports over other foreigners? I believe we have. Our citizens go there, commence and pursue trade, without being subject to the alien duty, paid by other foreigners. Our tobacco pays 1s. 3d. per lb. duty, when all other pays 3s. 6d. per lb. Our pot and pearl ashes are free: others pay 2s. per cwt., which is equal to the freight. Our naval stores pay less duty than others pay, which, acting as a bounty to us, enables us to send these bulky articles to such a distance. Some of our wood is in the same situation. The exportation of our lumber on these advantageous terms, is particularly beneficial to, and promotive of our shipping. A cargo of lumber, which costs not more than 400 or 500 pounds, would sell for 12 or 1400. Mr. S. observed, that he presumed no one would tax him with being prejudiced in favor of Great Britain; he had suffered by them severely; he had fought against their usurpations; and, should his duty call him, he trusted he should not hesitate to do so again. It is not what Britain may suffer by the system proposed, but the disadvantage which will be the consequence to the United States, that ought to be taken into consideration. Our duty is not to injure others, but to protect our own interest.

Mr. S. then inquired, what have we done to benefit our own commerce? In the first Congress, a duty of fifty cents on foreign tonnage, and six cents on our own, gave an advantage of forty-four cents in our favor; and put us more than on a footing with the extra light-money, of 1s. 9d. sterling, a ton, on our vessels, charged in all their ports, except London. We also laid a duty of one-tenth extra on goods by foreign vessels. What has been its consequence? A gentleman from Virginia stated that in 1680, Great Britain passed their Navigation Act, when the foreign trade was one-fourth of the whole; in 1770, it was lessened to one-sixth. What is the consequence of our law? The foreign tonnage in 1770, was nearly one-third of the whole. In 1792, the foreign tonnage was reduced nearly to one-fourth, or as 244 to 568. This being the case, we have, by our existing laws and industry, decreased the proportion of the foreign tonnage one-sixth. Thus has our existing laws done nearly as much in two years for us, as the navigation laws of Great Britain did for them in forty years. Under the existing state of things, regulations to accelerate a progress already without example. The same gentleman said, that the manufactures of Great Britain amount to fifty-one millions, and that the proportion to America is two millions—say four per cent. of the exports of that country. Will she give up her Navigation Act for the profits of four per cent. on her exports? Can it be expected that she will deviate from a system which more than one hundred years experience has confirmed the utility of?

With respect to France, Mr. Smith acknowledged, in warm terms, the obligations this country was under to that, for the services rendered during the war. France, said he, will be a Republic, and as republicans, they will treat with us on fair, liberal, and reciprocal terms. Mr. S. concluded by reading the following comparative statement:

ENGLAND.

1st. American ships pay no more duty of tonnage in her ports, 44 cents duty of her ports than her own pay; tonnage more than her own but they pay 1s. 9d. sterling, ships pay.

except in the port of London, where all pay alike.

2d. The ships of America carry freely to Great Britain the produce of the United States, (where her own ships are permitted,) when imported in her own and pay the same duty ships; which amount altogether that is paid by the most to the whole freight on an as-sorted cargo of British manufactures.

3d. All trade in American ships to the British West Indies, is prohibited, except in times (such as the present) of war and particular scarcity.

4th. The trade to the British East Indies is free for Americans; they enter and still freely there, as well their cargoes as ships, when even British ships are prohibited.

5th. American shipping can carry no foreign article to Great Britain, nor any thing except her own produce: they cannot carry any of her manufactures, except pot and pearl ashes, pig and bar iron: which articles are free from duty.

6th. Great Britain admits from America, free of duty, plank, pot and pearl ashes, bar and pig iron, when she charges a duty on the same articles from other nations, equal in some instances, to a full freight; which enables America to transport such bulky articles on equal terms: she charges 1s. 3d. per lb. on American tobacco, and 3s. 6d. on all other.

7th. America admits no gross articles, pay no duty. 8th. America admits nothing free of duty from Great Britain, that is not equally free from all other countries.

Mr. FINDLEY next rose. He suggested a difference in rising on the subject, as it required a knowledge of circumstances and facts which seldom came under his consideration; but, having examined the case with sufficient attention to determine his vote, as no member claimed the floor, he would offer some of those reasons which were convincing to himself.

He took notice of the member last up, who asserted that the additional duties proposed were not intended for protecting manufactures, nor as additional revenues, but as bounties to the nations with which we have commercial treaties; that no other nation could furnish us with sufficiency of goods; and who then asked in what manner we will raise our revenues? To which he answered, that the political intention of the resolution was to secure our independence as a commercial nation, and to make it the interest of certain European nations to enter into commercial treaties with us; they have refused to treat, because they enjoy more advantages without treaties than they could expect any treaties could secure to them. He alleged it was not properly a commercial war, or a principle of revenge or retaliation, that was intended by the resolutions. Revenge for supposed insults offered to the Crown, may be the principle of the duelling wars undertaken by European despots, but such principles are inadmissible in Republican politics. The design of the proposed measure is to secure a reciprocity of advantages in commerce without war; it is calculated to procure justice, to secure the practical enjoyment of that independence, which, though we have established, after an arduous contest, we have not reaped the advantages which ought to have resulted from it, nor put ourselves in a capacity to protect it. The first attempt to revise the Confederation was expressly within the design of vesting Congress with sufficient powers for rendering our commerce more independent. When the revision of the Government did take place, this was a principal object, both in the enlargement of the powers and regulating the forms of the Government. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Madison] has explained the reasons why such measures were not more early adopted, and has properly suggested that those reasons no longer exist.

The proposed restrictions are necessary to raise a competition in European markets, and gave an option to our merchants in different nations. Though the assortment for some time might not be so general in other countries as Britain, yet certainly much of the necessary supplies, such as linens and woollens, have been got on as good terms in France as in England, and have been in quantity more than equal to the demand. But, depending on one nation for our whole supplies, subjects us too much to the caprice and the fate of that nation. Supposing that nation to be at war with ourselves or our allies, we must be much embarrassed in our supplies, and will find it difficult to find goods from nations who had not provided for our demands. Supposing a state of bankruptcy or insurrection to take place in the nation on which we depend for supplies, we will share in their distresses. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Sumner] and others considered the credit to which our merchants are admitted in Britain as more than equivalent to the restrictions we are subjected to by that nation. It is urged that the extensive use we are admitted to make of British capital ought to have great weight in our estimates of the comparative advantage of our commerce with Britain. Mr. F. begged leave totally to differ with those gentlemen in opinion; he considered the extensive use made by our merchants of British credit as a very great political evil; it promoted an unfavorable balance of trade, and enables our merchants to import goods in greater abundance than we need; consequently, our industry, especially in domestic manufactures, is discouraged, and luxury is promoted. It is an old observation, that the borrower is a servant to the lender. The consequence of the British credit so much boasted of is, that our merchants are many millions in debt to the manufacturers or merchants of Britain; our storekeepers are in proportion indebted to the merchant, and country people are in debt to the storekeepers for such manufactures as they could have lived well without, and which many of them were not able to pay for. Thus credit, while it enriches a few individuals, occasions a ruinous system of debts and bankruptcies to pervade our country, from the cities to the most remote boundaries. But a greater evil presents itself to our consideration. This credit promotes a system of British influence dangerous to our political security. The merchant who depends upon British credit is necessarily under the influence of the hand that feeds him; the storekeeper is in debt to the merchant and subject to his influence. And such storekeepers, abounding not only in all the small towns, but in every place of public resort, consequently this extensive British credit is a source of British influence spread through the whole United States. He said that, since Congress met, he had been industrious to procure information on this subject. He knew that before the country people expected such regulations with anxiety, and he now knew that the merchants who were able to carry on business without the aid of the British credit, were very generally in favor of commercial restrictions; and that those who were not in that situation were generally against them; these different principles naturally arose from their respective situations.

He expressed some surprise that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. S.] spoke of the French Treaty with so little candor. Why did he not mention the guarantee of the West Indies as a part of the commercial treaty, as well as the admitting the French privateers and prizes into our ports? The truth is, neither the one nor the other were of the commercial parts of the treaty. The gentleman knew that the exertions of that nation in our behalf, by their arms and their money, were the parts of the treaty relative to the opening our ports to their privateers, prizes, &c. He said the British restrictions to which we were subjected, the encouragements given to the hostile Indians, was no longer a secret. The letting loose the Algerines on our commerce, (a fact which he trusted no member would now deny), the refusing to fulfil the definitive treaty, or to enter into a commercial one—all tended to prove that this was the proper time to assert our own commercial rights, not for revenge, but for self-defence. The present embarrassed state of Europe rendered such a measure necessary, and encouraged the prospect of its being effectual.

Mr. Ames wished, that gentlemen, instead of indefinite declamation, would lay their finger on each particular wrong that Britain had done to us. He did not know of any particular advantage, that we had derived in our commerce with France. He wished to discountenance a spirit of revenge, and to ascertain on what side the benefits of our commerce lay, and wherein they consisted. He did not like unfair comparisons.

Mr. Nicholas said, that he would not, at this time of day, attempt to detain the House any further than by just observing that the practice of comparisons had originated among the gentlemen who opposed the resolutions.

At this stage, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 16.

The resolution sent from the Senate, "proposing to the several States an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the Judicial power," was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit, for your information, certain intelligence lately received from Europe, as it relates to the subject of my past communications.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, January 16, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Boudinot, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1794; which was read twice and committed.

The Speaker laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of the expenses of the Commissioners of Loans, on which the estimate of $40,000 is founded, made pursuant to the order of the 10th instant; which were read and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State, on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries. When

Mr. Nicholas rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I feel a great embarrassment in speaking on this subject, from a distrust of my ability to treat properly its acknowledged importance, and from the apparent expectation of the audience. I feel too, as the member from Maryland who spoke yesterday did, from the imputation of motives, well knowing that the Representatives of my country are industriously reported to be enemies of the Government and promoters of anarchy, and that the present measure is imputed to these principles. It is somewhat remarkable that farther North, we are charged with selfishness and want of attachment to the general welfare, for a supposed opposition to measures of the import of the present. I mention this contradictory inference, to show that the shameful designs charged upon us, are not proved by the fact, and to place the guilt where it only exists, in the malignity of the accuser.

It is a commonly received opinion, that trade should be intrusted to the direction of those immediately interested in it, and that the actual course of it, is the best which it could take; this principle is by no means a safe one, and, as applied to the trade of America, is extremely fallacious. It can never be just where the beginning and growth of commerce have not been free from all possible constraint, as to its direction; as that can never be called a business of election which has been created under foreign influence. The manner in which America was first peopled, and the nurture she received from Great Britain, afford the most striking contrast to the requisite before mentioned. The first inhabitants of America were educated in Great Britain, and brought with them all the wants of their own country, to be gratified chiefly by the productions of that country. Aided by British capital, in the settlement of the wilderness, and depending on the same means for the conveyance of its produce to a place of consumption, it was inevitable, that the demand for British commodities should keep pace with the improvement of the country. In the commencement of American population, and its early stages, there does not appear to have been a chance of comparing the advantages of commercial connexion, with different countries, and it will be found that in its progress, it was still more restrained. In the last years of the dependence of America on Great Britain, the principal part of America was occupied by large trading companies, composed of people in Great Britain, and conducted by factors, who sunk large sums in the hands of the farmers, to attach them to their respective stores, by which means, competition was precluded, and a dependence on the supplies of those stores completely established. Since the Revolution, the business has been conducted by persons in the habit of dependence on Great Britain, and who had no other capital, than the manufactures of that country furnished on credit. The business is still almost wholly conducted by the same means. In no stage of its growth, then, does there appear to have been a power in the consumer to have compared the productions of Great Britain with those of any other country, as to their quality or price, and therefore there is no propriety in calling the course of trade, the course of its choice.

The subject before the Committee naturally divides itself into navigation and manufactures, in speaking of which, I shall offer some other considerations, to show that the same effects are by no means to be expected from the greatest commercial wisdom in individuals, which are in the power of the general concert of the community; the one having in view profit on each separate transaction, the other, promoting an advantageous result to the whole commerce of the country.

In considering the importance of navigation to all countries, but especially to such as have so extensive a production of bulky articles as America, I think I shall show that the last observation is accurately right, and that the interest of the whole community, not those only who are the carriers, but those also who furnish the object of carriage, positively demands a domestic marine, equal to its whole business; and that, even if it is to exist under rates higher than those of foreign navigation, it is to be preferred. In circumstances of tolerable equality, that can never however entirely be the case; for, in the carriage of the produce of one country, by the shipping of another, to any other place, there is considerably more labor shipping belongs, than would have been by domestic shipping, as the return to their own country is to be included. On this ground, it may be confidently asserted, that where the materials of navigation are equally attainable, they will always be more advantageously employed by the country for whose use they are intended; and that if, under such circumstances, another country is employed as the other cause than interest, as it respects that particular business. A dependence on the shipping of another country tends to establish a place of deposit in that country, of those exports which are for the use of others, if it is at a convenient distance from them. The superintendence of property makes short voyages desirable for the owner, and the connexion that soon takes place between the money capital of a country and its shipping interests, greatly strengthens the vortex. The attainment of wealth beyond the demands of navigation, leads to an interest in the cargo itself, and then the agency in selling to the consumer becomes important. It is apparent that, as the final sale depends on the wants of the purchaser, all intermediate expenses of care and agency must be taken from the price to which the maker would be entitled. Our own commerce has involved this loss, in a remarkable degree, and it has gone to an enormous extent, from a necessity of submitting to the peridy of agents, arising from a dependence established by means of the so much boasted credit.

That there is this tendency in the employment of foreign shipping, is not only proved by the commercial importance of Holland, which became thus from her naval resources the store-house of Europe, without furnishing anything from her own productions, but also from the varied experience of America. Before the Revolution, every thing for European consumption was carried to Great Britain, but, since America has possessed shipping of her own, and in the Northern States, there has been an accession of capital, the export to England is reduced one-half. It is true, indeed, that there is still nearly one-half of what she receives, that is re-exported, but it will be found that she still retains a proportioned share of those influences which formerly carried the whole. Great Britain, under all the discouragements of our laws, which we are told by the mercantile members of the committee, amount to a prohibition where they have any rivals, did, until the European war, possess one-third of the foreign tonnage employed in America. This has been supported by the dependence into which the Southern States were placed by credit, and here, as in every other step of the connexion, this engine extorts advantages from us, beyond the compensation which is always secured in the first advance. If there wanted other proof of the British interest in the American navigation being supported in direct opposition to our interests, it may be found in the comparative state of the tonnage employed, where it appears that, after the protecting duties once had their effect, the additional tonnage, to a considerable amount, has been entirely American, and that the British tonnage has remained very nearly stationary, and in proportion to their undue influence.

In time of war, in addition to the inconveniences before stated, which are enhanced by throwing the trade from its accustomed channel, there are great and important losses brought on a country by this kind of dependence. If your carriers are parties to the war, you are subjected to the war freight and war insurance on your cargo, and you are cut off from all the markets to which they are hostile; and, indeed, from our experience in the present war, I may say you are cut off from the market of your carriers themselves, as it would have been impossible for British vessels to have escaped in our seas last summer. To what extent this loss goes may be seen from a calculation in the Secretary of State's Report on the fisheries, making the proportion of war to that of peace in the one hundred years, as forty-two to one hundred; and on that calculation there can be no hesitation in determining that the interest of the farmers requires that this foreign dependence should end here.

But the European war, by making a temporary exclusion of British shipping, has already brought on us the greatest mischief of such a regulation; and, by the encouragement it has afforded to our shipping, almost completed the remedy: so that we have reason to consider this as a fortunate period. But, it is not merely the advancement of our marine that is contemplated by the present resolutions, the security of that which we have is also dependent on them. The danger from the Algerines has been estimated in this House at five per cent. on the vessel and cargo, but the whole encouragement to our own shipping in our existing laws consists in the one-tenth additional duty on goods imported in foreign vessels. Whenever there shall be an European peace, which cannot be far distant, the whole difference between the two sums will be a direct encouragement on British ships, and will probably be equal to two freights. Do gentlemen rely on the precarious prospect of building frigates, and the more precarious service to be rendered by them when built, so much as to neglect any other regulations for the safety of our shipping when they are so much in their power?

Having shown that the actual state of our commerce is by no means the most beneficial, as far as navigation is concerned, I will proceed to consider the benefits derived from the consumption of those European manufactures which form the principal part of the stores of America. And here it may safely be said, that national policy by no means justifies the almost exclusive preference given to those of Great Britain. It is not always true that the commodity which is bought for least money is the best bargain, for the means of payment form an important consideration in all traffic, and accommodations in it may more than counterbalance an inequality of price. If one man will receive an article in exchange which you can sell to no other, it will certainly be a saving to deal with him at a high advance on his property. If there are countries which would become great consumers of American produce, on the terms of reciprocal consumption, and we find a difficulty, as is often the case, in vending that produce, is it not of great national importance to excite those acts which are to become the foundation of the connexion, even if, in the first instance, it is to be attended with inconvenience and loss? France may be made a connexion of this sort. She is at this time almost, if not quite, on a footing with Great Britain in the consumption of American products, and every hand which shall receive employment from us will add to her wants. We are told that it is of no less importance to us to find a country which can supply us advantageously than one which will consume our productions; and that, as commerce is no longer carried on by barter, it is no less beneficial to sell in one country and buy in another than if we could complete the exchange in the same country. This might be true, if your production was limited, and the demand for it certain; but, with a greatly improving agriculture, and some risk in our markets, the object is important. Great Britain being the most dependent on the agricultural interest, and the national wealth being probably at the greatest height, there is no expectation that her consumption will increase. On the other hand, as labor is now to receive its direction in France to the manufacturing arts, so far as concerns America, you will take from the agricultural strength a large class of people, and by that means create a dependence on you, at least to the amount of their own consumption, and the wealth you will diffuse will give ability to thousands who are now too poor to bid for your commodities. Nor is it probable that you will purchase this important benefit on very disadvantageous terms: for it is agreed on all hands that many important arts are well understood there, and that labor, which forms the principal part of the cost of most articles, is considerably cheaper in France than in England.

Another very important operation of a discrimination in favor of France will be that, by encouraging liberal industry, you may put an end to some practices which, in the existing state of consumption, greatly depreciate our commodities. I mean the public provision made in granaries, and the supply from them in times of scarcity, which destroys the competition that raises every thing to its just value. Different consequences have been foretold as likely to result from those measures, to which I shall give a short examination. We are told that the preference long since given by our laws has been equal to a prohibition of British vessels, and that, to the extent to which it has gone, the best effects have been produced. To secure this operation from a recent attack, and at the same time to extend it to some branches of trade, to which its principles would equally extend, is the object of the marine resolutions. We have no reason to apprehend bad consequences from an action which has hitherto had good consequences. As to the increased duties on manufactures, I think the prospect in no way threatening; for, if there should be found no country to supply our wants on better terms, the diminution of consumption will be only in proportion to the duty. This can be by no means alarming, considered as the worst consequence of the measure to men with whom the impost is the favorite mode of collecting the revenue, at a time when the public wants are equal to any possible produce. If there shall be found a competitor with Great Britain for our consumption, the great object will be attained, as it must be accompanied by a corresponding consumption of American productions. But we are told that there will be a conflict of commercial regulations between this country and Great Britain, and that the consequence will be, the loss of the market she affords us. The probable consequences of such a conflict will best determine whether it is to be expected, as it will commence on her part as well as ours, with a view to consequences. The danger which she can alone apprehend is the loss of the market for her manufactures; and to obviate this, it would be absurd to widen the breach between us, as that would tend, in a direct proportion, to the establishment of unfriendly habits and manufactures, either here or in other countries, which would rival her own. If, however, the ultimate advantage would justify such measures, the immediate distress of her people would forbid it. The American trade must be the means of distributing bread to several hundred thousand persons, whose occupations would be wholly ended with the trade, and the Government is by no means in a situation to bear their discontent. Their navigation and manufactures draw many important ingredients from America which would be lost to them. The creditors of the people of America, to an immense amount, would be deprived of the remittances which depend on a friendly intercourse. On the whole, it would add to the disorders of the Government among those who, perhaps, have heretofore contributed to its support, without gratifying anything but an arrogant resentment. But we are told that our own citizens would be equal sufferers, and are more to be injured by being stopped in a career of rapid improvement. It will be hard to anticipate any real misfortune to America in such a contest, unless the temporary loss of indulgences, which are by no means necessary, can be so called. The consumption of Great Britain is, according to the most friendly calculation, not more than one-third of our purchases from her, and, therefore, the national wealth, independent of the gratification of our appetites, will receive an immense addition, and a vast fund will be procured to make lasting and valuable improvements, which would be degraded by comparison with the gewgaws of a day. It is to be remarked that the diminution of our exports would be divided among large classes of people, and in all cases forms a deduction from the annual income, rather than a total loss. This will result from the various objects of American industry and the division of the markets of its produce. This forms an important difference between America and Great Britain, in an estimate of the effects of a rupture between the two countries. In my opinion, the habits of the Southern States are such as to require the control which is said to be the consequence of these measures. Under the facility offered by the modes of trade before spoken of, and the credit which is said to be so beneficial, they have not only involved themselves in debt, but have contracted habits which, with the power of gratification, must always keep them so. We did hope that the administration of justice would have corrected the evil, but we now find that it cannot be corrected but by entire changes. It is founded in the policy of the merchant himself, and this circumstance is enough to present to the minds of the Committee a long train of dependent mischiefs. It is a fact, supported by the best evidence, that our merchants who get their goods from the manufacturer pay as much for them as the shopkeeper who buys at Baltimore or Philadelphia. This is one of the consequences of the want of credit which always will follow a reliance on collection from farmers; and there can be no doubt that the merchant is indemnified for his disgrace as well as his advance. The result of the whole train of indulgence is, that our goods are bought at an advance from a half to one-fourth of what they could be afforded for in cash sales. Nor does the mischief stop here. It brings a subjection which materially affects the sale of our produce. I do believe, myself, that the war with Great Britain did not bring half the mischief on us that their credit has; and I very much suspect a credit for consumption will always be found equally mischievous. It by no means resembles money loans, as is insinuated by the gentleman from South Carolina, by freeing a man's own resources for any other use. It is certain that there is no other safe regulation of a farmer's expenses than his income; and experience every day proves that, when so regulated, they always fall short of the income, and that, when they depend on credit, they always exceed it, and thereby subject future revenue. Lessening the importation of foreign manufactures will increase our household fabrics, which experience has proved to be highly profitable, as the labor is done by a part of the community of little power in any other application. Regular efforts in this way have been, in my country, certainly productive of independence.

It is acknowledged that we may derive great advantages from France in our commerce, but it is said they should be secured by treaty, and we should not pay beforehand for them. If advantages are to be drawn by treaty from foreign nations, to enable the Executive to procure them, we must advance the impost beyond the revenue standard, or they will have nothing to give in exchange. Will gentlemen agree to involve France in this measure indiscriminately, when we have already a commercial treaty with her, which was concomitant with that treaty which gave us independence? Will they, under such proofs of friendliness, and while they are laboring under a revolution that must strengthen our connexion, show distrust of their justice, when the distinction now proposed may give them a knowledge of those advantages they may derive from our trade, and thereby make them more eager for a permanent contract? It will be always in our power, when we find ourselves deceived, to restore the equality with Great Britain. We are asked what will become of our revenue under such an establishment? The answer is obvious, from my former observations: if the consumption is reduced only by means of revenue, the revenue will increase; if it is lessened by competition, it will not be diminished, for the present rates will continue on all foreign goods, and we shall be better able to pay from the improvement of our foreign markets. But if there should be a diminution without lessening the power of the people to pay, what mischiefs will there be? Every body understands that the people pay the revenue, although it is collected by custom-house officers, and there is reason to believe that the expense of collection is greater in that way than any other, as there is not only the apparent expense, but a secret compensation to the merchants for advancing it.

But we are told that we are including countries in the general description which are our best customers—Spain, Portugal, the Hanse Towns, and Denmark. It will be found that they are little within the reach of the propositions, not being carriers, and very little manufacturers of the articles to be taxed. It will be in the power of the Legislature to save them, in filling up the blanks; but this is not intended to shut out any nation which chooses to trade with us on liberal terms; and, if we are satisfied with our footing in their trade, there is no doubt but we can secure it by treaty. They will not complain of our taking away benefits which they may resume at any time. We are told that this business is merely commercial, and that we should not think of our political relations to Great Britain; but, in my opinion, most of our grievances have commercial objects, and therefore are to be remedied by commercial resistance. If you take away what is contended for, contest must end. The Indian war and the Algerine attacks have both commercial views, or Great Britain must stand without excuse for instigating the most horrid cruelties. I consider, however, the propositions before you as the strongest weapon America possesses, and the most likely to restore her to all her rights, political and commercial; and I trust I have shown that the means will have a beneficial effect, if they should fail as a remedy with respect to Great Britain.

Mr. GOODHUE: Mr. Chairman, the propositions now before us having been considered by several gentlemen, who have already spoken, and who have given such a particular detail of calculations, I shall confine myself to some general observations on the subject.

The gentleman from Maryland has made an observation which struck me very forcibly as applied to the subject before us, because it is a maxim to which all mankind have assented, and upon which there is no friendship in trade;—it was this: "there is no necessary consequence, there ought to be no hatred in trade." By following a path founded upon so obvious a maxim as the foregoing, we may be sure of a right guide, but if we deviate from it, we are in danger of being led into unforeseen error and mischief. It is unquestionably our duty to attend to the navigation and commerce of our country, and give it every proper encouragement which time and circumstances admit; this has ever been my wish and my conduct.

This object, so important and desirable, must be effected by fixed principles and regulations, such as giving our vessels a decided preference in our own ports above the ships of every other nation whatever, by paying less tonnage and other duties; by suffering no foreign ships to bring into the United States the productions of any other country than the one to which they belong; and by prohibiting foreign ships from coming to the United States from those places where our own ships are prohibited.

These are the fixed principles and regulations by one or all of which our navigation and commerce can only be promoted, and must never be deviated from, when adopted in favor of any one nation whatever—unless it be in return for some special advantage granted to us by any particular nation as an equivalent. Hitherto, our Government has proceeded to distinguish foreign ships, only by making them pay greater tonnage and duties than our own. If circumstances required it, and the time is judged a seasonable one, I shall be willing to proceed further.

Let us examine what advantages we enjoy in consequence of any commercial treaties we have already formed, for the propositions before us are proposed to affect only those nations with whom we have no treaties. We have commercial treaties with Prussia, Sweden, France, and Holland, and in the dominions of neither of those Powers have our ships or the produce of this country (except in the single article of our oil in France) been admitted on any more favorable terms than the ships or produce of any other nation; and for this obvious reason, because our treaties only insure the advantages they may grant to the most favored nation; and, being circumstanced in such a manner as not judging it for their interests to distinguish any one by its favors, we are left only in the enjoyment of a trade with them on the terms common to all other nations. This being the case, I would not give one farthing to have like treaties formed with every other nation, for they have not been, and never can be, of any service to us; if we expect to derive any advantage from commercial treaties, we must stipulate for some certain good, for some other good which we may grant them in return.

But it is said, Mr. Chairman, we are particularly injured by the commercial restrictions of Great Britain. The fact is, we enjoy in our trade with that country all the advantages of commerce, and in some instances greater than they grant to any other nation. Our pot ash, and several other articles, pay a less duty in Great Britain than the like articles do from any other country, and in no instance do I believe they pay greater. Our ships are allowed generally to carry to Great Britain and Ireland the productions of this country on the same terms their own ships do. We have also free admission into their extensive territories in India, where they prohibit the ships of their own country, unless they belong to their India Company.

It is true our commerce is cramped by a refusal of our ships into their Colonies of Nova Scotia, Canada, Newfoundland, and their West India Islands, which is the only evil of a commercial kind we have to complain of in their regulations. But this is not an evil in consequence of distinguishing us from any other nation; they deny that privilege to all others, and it has taken effect as it relates to us in consequence of our becoming an independent nation. The evil of being prohibited their Colonies arises from the existing circumstances of things. Their contiguity to the United States compels them to carry on a considerable trade with us for supplies, and in which it is but just we should be partakers; and, if we mean to redress this evil, we should point out measures to that object, and say no foreign ships shall come to the United States from any place where our ships are prohibited; or, if they do come, they should come under some peculiar disadvantages. This would be meeting the evil direct.

If we raise the duties on their manufactures imported into this country, as is proposed by the resolutions now under consideration, with a view of compelling them to be more liberal in their commercial arrangements with us, we shall surely miss our aim, for it is certain France in her present situation is by no means able to supply us, whatever she may do hereafter. No other country, at present, but Great Britain, can supply us; it therefore follows, undeniably, if such be the fact, that if we import their goods and lay an additional duty on them, the blow aimed at them will fall on us, by raising the price to the consumers in this country equal to the proposed additional duty.

It is said the chief of the foreign tonnage that comes to this country is British, and this is an evil; if our object is to promote our own navigation, I should suppose the evil consisted in having our trade so much carried on in foreign bottoms, and not as belonging to one or another foreign nation; and, if we meant further to encourage our navigation, we ought to raise the tonnage duty on all foreign shipping; this would be coming to the object. But how comes it we have so many more British ships than others? Have we granted them a monopoly, or may not the ships of every other nation come here on the same terms they do? The reason, then, why there are so many more British than other foreign ships which come here, is not because we have encouraged it by any regulations we have adopted, but because they are a more enterprising, commercial people than their neighbors, and from other causes which will ever influence and direct commerce.

It is also mentioned that a considerable part of the products of this country shipped to Great Britain, is not consumed there, but re-shipped to other countries, and that we ought to make such regulations as that such excess should pass directly to the country where they are consumed, without their first going through Great Britain.

I should think it strange if any one was to refuse selling an article because he understood the person who wanted to purchase it would not be the consumer, but he would afterwards sell it to another; this would not certainly influence, and ought not. Let us examine and see whether our navigation has received any encouragement by the regulations already adopted by this Government. In 1790, our navigation was but little more than one-half of all the tonnage entered in the United States; in 1791, it was three-fifths; and in 1792 it was nearly two-thirds. Foreign tonnage has actually decreased since that period 14,000 tons, while ours has increased 171,000 tons. If the increase is not sufficient, then we must increase the tonnage duty on foreign shipping, and take such other measures as I have hinted at to promote the object; though I confess such is our delicate situation at this time, I am inclined to believe experiments are hazardous; and I should be strongly apprehensive, if we pass any restrictive laws at this time, that shall affect Great Britain only, as such is her close alliance with most of the European nations, and especially with Spain, that she will be fully able to influence some of them at least, and Spain in particular, (who is not very friendly,) to be associated with her in any counter-regulations she may think proper to pursue by way of retaliation.

Mr. CLARK differed from many members who had spoken before him, in the view they took of the subject; he conceived it ought to be considered in a political light. We had many wrongs to complain of, and we should endeavor to obtain redress. The English have violated our Treaty, just after it was ratified, by taking away our negroes, and since by holding our posts; they have also let the savages on our backs, and have not they let loose the Algerines upon us? Shall we sit still and bear it? How can we help it, it is asked? They will retaliate, we are told. How retaliate? Will they refuse to sell us their manufactures? He remembered that, even in old times, a non-importation agreement made them repeal their stamp act. We have surely as well now as we had then a right not to buy their goods; we don't want to cram our provisions down their throats, or to force them to buy our lumber. During the non-importation agreement, we did not perish with cold; we found, even then, that among ourselves we could make wherewith to clothe ourselves; we are surely as able to do it now. We then gained our point; we should now be much more powerful with the same weapon; many of her manufacturers are already starving for want of employment. We should add greatly to their distress, and soon bring the Government to their senses, and they will be glad to enter into a commercial treaty with us.

The balance of trade with Great Britain is much against us; and by carrying to Portugal and Spain what we send to them, we should receive cash in return. France will not always be in a storm, and a supply of the manufactured articles we want may soon be received from that quarter.

He did not see to what purpose calculations three hours long had been brought forward. It was very well for merchants to calculate in their counting-houses; but he conceived the Legislature should determine the question upon political considerations. He concluded by remarking, that he believed by this time the Committee must pretty clearly see that he was in favor of the resolutions.

Mr. PARKER considered the resolutions on the table as indefinite and unintelligible. If revenue is the object, we should remember the remark of Dr. Swift, that in the arithmetic of taxation, two and two do not always make four, but sometimes only one. He thought there was a jarring in the third resolution, which contradicted the first. The leading clause of the first resolution, which has occasioned so long a debate, is in these words: "That the interest of the United States would be promoted by further restrictions and higher duties, in certain cases, on the manufactures and navigation of foreign nations employed in the commerce of the United States, than those now imposed." The third resolution which Mr. P. referred to, is in these words: "That the duty on vessels belonging to the nations having commercial treaties with the United States, ought to be reduced to — per ton." The resolutions meant either too much, or nothing. He would move to amend the first resolution, but that he hoped it would be altogether cast aside.

Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland, rose and apologized to the Committee for presuming to intrude upon them a second time by the delivery of his sentiments. He said that a personal attack had been made yesterday upon him in that House. It had met him out of doors, and had gone into the world. After he had done speaking yesterday, a member had risen, and held forth as a fundamental observation, that "gentlemen possessing capitals of their own were in favor of the propositions; but that dealers upon credit were against them." When this remark was made, as he had but just sat down from delivering his negative to the resolutions, he could not help thinking himself aimed at as one of those dealers upon credit. [Here the member referred to rose, and solemnly declared that a personal allusion to Mr. SMITH had never entered his mind.] Mr. S. went on to observe, that the whole assertion was erroneous. The merchants of America are men of liberal sentiments—more so, he believed, than merchants of any other part of the world. They are not to be biassed by the petty motives of interest, in prejudice to the public interest of their country. The gentleman whom he referred to had spoke of an alarming British influence in some of the commercial cities of America. He had alleged that merchants, by their connexion with Britain, would be under its influence; but there was no such thing. In this country, merchants studied the Constitution, and were attached to it. In other countries, they minded only profit. As a reflection had been thrown on merchants who dealt upon credit, he should take leave to observe that credit was a very good thing. As to himself, he had, before the war began, acquired, by his industry, as much property as placed him beyond the necessity of credit. By the war, he was reduced to nothing. After the peace, he again began as he set out at first. By the same industry and the same talents, he had once more acquired independence. By the British buccaneers, he had lost as much, since the present war began, as the gentleman to whom he rose in reply, would think a tolerable fortune for dividing among his sons; yet he could still spare time from his business for the service of his country. He said, that at first hearing the resolutions, he had been rather prejudiced in their favor. One of them was indeed a very enticing resolution, and at first view pleased him very much. [The resolution to which Mr. S. referred is the seventh, and runs in these words:

"Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, That provision ought to be made for liquidating and ascertaining the losses sustained by citizens of the United States, from the operation of particular regulations of any country, contravening the Law of Nations, and that such losses be reimbursed in the first instance, out of the additional duties on the manufactures, productions, and vessels of the nations establishing such unlawful regulations."]

He since opposed them, from a conviction that they were injudicious. This gentleman and others had spoken with complacency of destroying commercial credit. He would again repeat his affirmation that credit was a good thing. To destroy it would establish an aristocracy in commerce, which was as bad as an aristocracy in Government. He explained this expression, by adjoining, that the dissolution of credit would confine trade to merchants possessing large capitals and an old and established correspondence in the manufacturing countries. An apprentice of the best connexions, and most promising abilities, would find it impossible, at the expiration of his indentures, to begin business for himself upon such oppressive terms of competition. It would be requisite to send ready money to Europe at the time of commissioning the goods; that is, to pay for them six months before they were received. This operation would raise the price of them fifteen per cent., which would be a real tax. He was astonished to hear gentlemen speak with indifference as to the advantages of mercantile credit. The State of Georgia was rising into prosperity with a prodigious progress. And by what means was this effected? By credit, certainly; for it never could have been accomplished in any other way. He said that we should renounce all national animosities, and consider all mankind as one great family. Let us always go where we can sell best. Mr. S. closed a speech of uncommon animation, by saying that the resolutions reminded him of the story of the goose which laid golden eggs. Let us cut her up, said the boy, and we shall get them all at once. The ten per cent. of tonnage upon foreign vessels had been of great service; but the present plan was too abrupt.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 17.

A memorial of Andrew G. Fraunces, of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying to be furnished with an official copy of the proceedings on the subject of his memorial, presented the 19th ultimo, and that the House will speedily determine on the legality of his claim for the payment of certain warrants issued by the late Board of Treasury.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

Mr. BEATTY, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the Appropriation Bill, (Mr. TRENWELL in the Chair.) The Committee proceeded in the discussion, during which, Mr. BALDWIN rose repeatedly, for the purpose of inquiring into the expenses of various sums appropriated, for contingencies and other purposes, above the sums heretofore appropriated. His object was, that a committee should be appointed to make particular inquiry into the reasons of these excesses, and to report. A motion was at length made and carried, for the rising of the Committee. In the House, Mr. BALDWIN made a motion for the appointment of a special committee, to inquire into the cause of, and report on the expediency of, these excesses. This motion was agreed to, and a committee of five appointed.

PETITION OF DANIEL PARKER.

The House took into consideration the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the memorial of Daniel Parker. The substance of the Report is, that it may be for the interest of the United States to compound the debt due from the memorialist, and suggests the expediency of vesting a power somewhere to make the composition. It was moved that a committee should be appointed to prepare and report a bill pursuant to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Some debate ensued on this motion. It was opposed on the score of precedent, and that it might be better for the United States to lose the debt than to establish a precedent which might open a door to every delinquent debtor of the United States. If the memorialist is an honest man, and has any property, he will throw himself on the justice and humanity of his country. The conduct of the petitioner, in withdrawing from his country, and his consequent deportment, were reprobated. In support of the motion, it was said that the only question was, whether the United States would insist on receiving the whole of their demand, and receive nothing, or compromise their demand, and receive something. This, it was said, was not establishing a precedent; it was simply following the custom established in all similar cases by individuals. It was true that public bodies adopt generally a more rigid line of conduct, and perhaps with propriety in most cases; but, in the present instance, the memorialist is out of the country, out of the reach of the laws; he is able to pay something, but is not willing to be divested of all his property, and is still bound to discharge a balance he never can pay.

Mr. NICHOLAS proposed the following motion, as a substitute for the first motion, that a committee be appointed to inquire whether D. Parker & Co. have any equitable or other claims to a reduction of the balances which appear against them on the books of the Treasury of the United States, and report specially thereon to the House. This motion, after some further debate, was agreed to, and a committee of three appointed.

MONDAY, January 20.

QUAKERS' MEMORIAL.

A memorial was read from the people called Quakers. The substance of this memorial is, to request that Congress would pass a law to prohibit the citizens of the United States from transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to the West India Islands. The petition was read by the SPEAKER.

Mr. GILES wished that it might be referred to a select committee.

Mr. BOWNE wished that it should lie on the table for a day or two. He did not, by this, mean to oppose the principle of the memorial; but he understood that another, of the same tenor, was to be presented to the Senate. He therefore wished that it might be deferred till the House could see whether the Senate should take it up. If they did not, he should then move that it should be referred to a select committee. The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

ALGERINE AFFAIRS.

The Committee of Ways and Means, appointed pursuant to the resolutions of the House on the communications from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES relative to Algiers, brought in a report, which was twice read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Ordered, That it be printed for the use of the members.

The report states that the Naval force for the protection of the trade of the United States, shall consist of four ships of forty-four guns each, 18 and 9 pounders, and two of 20 guns each. The aggregate sum wanted for this purpose is estimated at six hundred thousand dollars; to raise which, one per cent. additional duty is proposed to be laid on imported goods now paying seven and one-half per cent.; five per cent. additional on stone, marble, &c.; and on all stone and earthen ware, three cents additional; on salt, per bushel, six cents additional, per ton, on all vessels of the United States employed in foreign trade; and twenty-five cents additional, per ton, on all other vessels.

On motion of Mr. FIRZMOSSE, an addition was made to the Committee of Ways and Means; so that it now consists of a member from every State, who are to make another report respecting the fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. GILMAN, Mr. WATTS, Mr. ORR, Mr. PATTON, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, be added to the committee appointed to report to this House the Naval force adequate to the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine corsairs, together with an estimate of the expense, and the ways and means for defraying the same.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. W. SMITH remarked, that in the discussion of the resolutions respecting commercial affairs, much stress had been laid on the suggestion, that Great Britain had not discovered any disposition to enter into a commercial treaty with the United States, informed the House that in the correspondence between the Executive of the United States and the Minister of Great Britain, as printed by order of the House, it appears, that there is a chasm occasioned by the omission of a letter from the Secretary of State to that Minister, which letter is referred to in a subsequent letter.

Mr. GILES said, that it was very possible the letter to which Mr. SMITH referred, never had existed. It was said to have been written on the 5th of December, 1791. It was likely enough that Mr. Hammond might have mistaken a date.

Mr. DEXTER said, that there was an evident chasm. A letter must have been suppressed.

Mr. MADISON thought that there was a chasm, which should be filled up, but it might do as well to defer the matter for a day or two, till inquiry should be made of the Secretary of State, why it had been withheld? Upon informing the President, he would either give it up, or mention the reasons why he should not.

Mr. BOURNE said, that a motion concerning papers to be obtained from the Secretary of State, had been lying on the table since the beginning of last week. He wished it to be read.

Mr. GILES and Mr. NICHOLAS thought there could be no use for this letter, but they would not oppose an inquiry for its production.

The House then agreed to a resolution proposed by Mr. W. SMITH, the purport of which is, that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be applied to for information on the subject, and requested to lay before the House the omitted letter, or such parts as he may think proper. It was then moved and seconded, that the PRESIDENT be made acquainted with the resolution now adopted, which was agreed to. It was then proposed, that a committee of three members should be appointed to wait on him for that purpose. The motion was negatived. It was then moved and agreed, that the committee should consist of two members.

A Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES, on the subject of the recall of the Minister of the French Republic. This Message states, that the conduct of the Minister had been with decided disapprobation, and the Government of France promises, that his recall shall be expedited without delay.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to examine the articles in which the present estimate exceeds the appropriations and actual settlements of preceding years, and report the causes, with their opinion of the expediency of such excess, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the copy of a Letter to him from the Commissioner of the Revenue, stating the causes which have delayed the report on the revenue arising from spirits distilled within the United States, and from stills, required by the order of this House of the second of March last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

It was then moved, that the House go into a Committee on the bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States.

The bill was discussed by paragraphs. The second section proposes, in substance, that those who continue in service to the expiration of their enlistment, shall receive thirty dollars in addition to their pay, to be paid to them personally, in proportion to the time they had been in service. This section, after some debate, was struck out.

A motion was made to strike out the last section which provides that the widows and orphans of officers who die, or are killed in the service, shall be entitled to three years' half pay. This motion after considerable debate, was carried.

A section was then proposed which provides for a donation of two hundred acres of land to every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private of the army, at the end of the service, provided they settle on the same. This motion, after several amendments, was agreed to.

[In discussing the clauses of the bill on the Military establishment, Mr. WADSWORTH said, that the American army was dwindling to nothing, for the want of proper officers. There was no suitable encouragement in the service, to compensate for the toils and dangers of a military life. Many officers would resign their commissions, if they could only get Government to accept of them. It would be necessary to make an augmentation of their pay, or do something else to encourage them. There was no incitement in this war, upon the principles of honor, because we had been told that the war itself was infamous. Some provision ought to be made for the widows and children of officers. Many of the widows of officers had been reduced to work with their own hands for bread, while their children had been sent to school by a subscription among their neighbors.]

Mr. CLARK, in reply, said, that there were many soldiers who would gladly resign. If an officer had twenty-seven dollars per month, and a soldier but three or four, is it not proper that the Government should provide as well for the widows and children of soldiers, as of officers? He was confident that the army could find plenty of officers.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was of opinion that the widows and children of soldiers were as much flesh and blood as those of officers; and that the State was as much obliged to the soldiers as to the officers. The latter were better paid than the former, and so were more likely to leave something behind them for the support of their families. He said that we lived under a Republican Government, where all ranks of men were equally entitled to the protection of the State.

Mr. SMITH considered it as highly unjust that there should be so great a difference between the pay of an officer and that of a soldier. It was proper to support rank, but the principle was carried too far. He would only ask what sort of officers were, and what soldiers were? He knew of no distinction. Why, then, should we provide for the widows and the children of the officers, and not for those of the soldiers, when the latter had but four dollars per month?

The fact is, said Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, that your best officers have either left the army, or are daily leaving it. The General finds it necessary to force them to stay. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. CLAIBORNE,] had seen service, and was, Mr. S. believed, as good a Republican as any in that House. He surely must know that the services of men of education could not, in any part of the world, be obtained at the same rate as those of the inferior classes. Gentlemen might speak of equality, but in practice the thing was impossible. As to women it was well enough known what sort of ladies commonly followed the camp. It would be absurd to place them on a level with the widows of officers, or to suppose that they deserved equally the protection of the States. The time would perhaps come when we should repent of having intrusted the army in other hands than those which at present kept it together.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that some of the officers who retired from the army were men of pleasure. He repeated his remarks upon equality.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, that we might talk of Republican armies, and Republican principles, as long as we pleased. By the former he understood nothing more than an army raised by a Republic. If good officers were not kept, it was certain the army must go to nothing, for it was as impossible to march an army into the field without officers, as it was for that House to do business without a Speaker or a Chairman. He knew of many young men who were fond of going into the army as officers. But time and reflection convinced them, for which he was very sorry, that it was not worth while for any gentleman to spend his life in the service. The consequence was, that the American army was losing, as fast as possible, its best officers.]

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with amendments.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 21.

A Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES communicating statements respecting the duties on distilled spirits; also sundry laws which have been passed by the Government Northwest of the Ohio.

A petition of several of the late officers and privates of the first Pennsylvania regiment was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for military services rendered, and losses and injuries sustained in the Army of the United States during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition, together with the petition of Catharine Myler, which lay on the table, be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That the memorial of the people called Quakers, at their yearly meeting held in Rhode Island, in the year 1793, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. WARD, Mr. GILES, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. GROVE; that they do examine the matter thereof and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. VENABLE, from the committee appointed to inquire into and report a state of facts respecting sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States, and their opinion on the propriety of remitting the foreign tonnage thereon, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States. The first amendment, to strike out the second section, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House. The second amendment, to strike out the last section in the words following to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That—year's half pay shall be allowed to all commissioned officers who shall serve for a term not less than three years, and until the Army shall be discharged."

Mr. SMITH said that he hoped this clause would not be stricken out. He had little to say, but what he had already remarked. The officers were leaving the service very fast; and if something was not done for the Army, we shall soon see an end of it. No respect whatever was shown by other citizens to the American uniform.

Mr. CLARK said that certain members of the House, on every question, were fond of pomposity. Officers who could not live upon their pay, could live nowhere. The back woods were not the place to spend much money. It was well known that there was another cause of complaint which distressed the officers.

Mr. FORRESTER thought it necessary to keep in the clause. He had been informed by several officers that want of adequate pay was a very great objection to staying in the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH said that he was glad to hear gentlemen speak out, and acknowledge that there were other causes of dissatisfaction. None of his correspondents in the Army had told him so; but he believed that there were such other causes. As to spending money, it would be spent in the back woods as well as in the cities, as the officers frequently had to pay four times the common price for articles there. He did not believe that we should long have three effective companies in the Army. He had nearly given up his hopes of that Army, and the rejection of this clause would just finish it.

The question on striking out this clause was taken by yeas and nays, and stood—yeas 64, nays 24, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Henry Dearborn, Uriah Forrest, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, Thomas

Hartley, William Hindman, William Irvine, Richard Bland Lee, Peter Muhlenberg, Thomas Scott, John S. Sherburne, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Spriggs, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, Peter Van Gasbeck, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and John Watts.

The other amendment, reported by the Committee of the Whole House was further amended, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The House then proceeded further to amend the said bill, and, on a motion made and seconded to add to the end thereof the following section, by way of amendment, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That, if any officer shall die, by reason of wounds or otherwise, while in the service of the United States, and shall leave a widow, or, if no widow, shall leave a child or children under age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to and receive the half of the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled, at the time of his death, for and during the term of — years; and, before the expiration of the said term of — years, the half-pay, for the remainder of the term, shall go to the support of the child or children of such deceased officer, while under the age of sixteen years; and in like manner the allowance to the child or children of such deceased officer, where there is no widow, shall be paid no longer than while there is a child or children under the age aforesaid: Provided, That no greater sum shall be allowed, in any case, to the widow, or to the child or children of any officer, than the half-pay of a Lieutenant Colonel."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 54, nays 32, as follows:

- YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Elias Boudinot, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Jonathan Dayton, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Uriah Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, William B. Orr, Josiah Parker, John Smilie, Israel Smith, Thomas Treadwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Peleg Wadsworth, Francis Walker, Artemas Ward, Benjamin Williams, and Paine Wingate.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

and explained by, the resolutions that follow it? In either sense, however, he declared he found objections against it. As a distinct proposition, it appeared to him highly exceptionable, because it did not possess those qualities which were indispensable to one of that nature; it was indefinite, inconclusive, and therefore, of itself, unintelligible. Could any expression, he asked, be more vague than the words "in certain cases"? They might embrace the vast world of commerce, or be confined to two of its smallest articles. Neither those words, nor any other part of it, enabled the mind to determine what particular interests were to be promoted, or what objects were to be attained by the restrictions and duties proposed. Was the increase of the revenue designed by them, or the encouragement and protection of our own manufactures, or merely a discrimination between those nations which had, and those which had not commercial treaties with the United States? These, Mr. D. remarked, were three distinct principles, each of them important, and deserving separate consideration, for they led to a very different course of inquiries, and would produce very different results. If the increase of the revenue was meant, the inquiry would principally be, whether any and what articles of traffic or commerce would bear new burdens, with a confidence that they would give the increase contemplated; for it had been said, and frequently repeated, that two and two do not always make four. If gentlemen were disposed to encourage our own manufactures, the question then would be, on what articles of foreign manufacture we might venture to lay prohibitory duties, and on what others it would be proper to impose only protecting duties? Prohibitory, in cases where the quantities manufactured among ourselves equalled, or might soon be made to equal, our home consumption; and protecting as to such others as could not, for a considerable length of time, be manufactured in this country in sufficient quantities for its supply. But if the plan of discrimination was the sole object, they were then, Mr. D. said, to take a very different view of the subject, and to aim their regulations not so much at the articles, as the agents of commerce, against nations, rather than merchandise. They would, in this case, find it necessary to weigh and determine whether the line of discrimination should be drawn between those nations in treaty and those not in treaty, or between the countries (whether in treaty or not) which had manifested a friendly, and those which had manifested a contrary disposition.

If, then, this proposition, viewed as an abstract one, established no certain principle, or if it involved and confounded a number so variant in their nature and tendency as he had stated them, there could no longer exist a doubt of the imprudence of agreeing to it. But, on the other hand, should it be considered as connected with, and explained by, the resolutions which follow, there were the strongest reasons for passing it by, and proceeding to the second. What member, Mr. D. asked, would be willing to vote for a proposition which admitted of such various meanings and different explanations, and depended as to its sense upon certain explanatory resolutions, each of which was to be separately discussed, and might be amended, altered, and even stricken out. Surely, he said, the gentlemen who were about to vote for it were not aware of the embarrassment into which such a step might lead them. In the probable event of an alteration of any of the other resolutions, this fundamental one might receive a construction, and be directed to objects, which members, who assented to it, had not foreseen, or would have opposed if they had foreseen. But this, Mr. D. said, was not all; there was another reason against adopting it as a fundamental proposition. The articles which were intended to explain it, were, in reality, false expositions of this text. The third article was in direct opposition to its letter and spirit, as it went to establish a diminution of restrictions and duties in certain cases, whereas the other contemplated "further restrictions and higher duties," as the true means of promoting the interests of the United States. Having declared his grounds of objection, Mr. D. said he should have offered an amendment, or proposed a substitute; were it not that he hoped the Committee would agree to pass over the first proposition.

Mr. Lee spoke as follows: The importance of the resolutions under consideration, is fully manifested both by the length and solemnity of the present discussion, and the universal solicitude which pervades our fellow-citizens. I have been deeply impressed with the awfulness of the present crisis; I have felt the magnitude of the subject before us; I have listened with attention to everything which has been offered to our consideration; I have been informed, I have been instructed, I have been delighted. My mind, which hesitated, has been enabled to form its decision. And, though, sir, it may be unnecessary, after this declaration, to take up any of the time of the Committee, I hope I shall meet with their pardon and indulgence, for soliciting a small portion of their attention. In the present jealous and censorious times, when it seems to have become fashionable, not more to inquire into the principles of measures, than into the motives of public agents, the task of explaining the reasons of his conduct, is necessarily imposed on every public servant, who does not wish to have his motives misinterpreted. But, sir, notwithstanding I feel the necessity of explaining myself on the present occasion, both from the consideration I have mentioned, and to exhibit to my constituents, (whose virtue, industry, and value in society, claim every attention, from me, to their interests,) the reasons of my conduct; I should not ask the present indulgence, if the subject had been altogether placed in those lights, in which it most forcibly strikes my mind. And, under this impression, sir, I should be unworthy of the seat I hold here, and of the confidence of my fellow-citizens, if I withheld aught, which appeared to me conducive to their interests, and the general welfare. Before I proceed to a detail of the particular considerations, which I mean to bring into the view of the Committee, I hope I shall be pardoned, while I attempt to establish some general abstract principles, which appear to me important to guide us in the present discussion. And, though at first view, they may seem remote from the subject, I hope the Committee will patiently attend me through the process of my reasonings, to those conclusions which will naturally result.

I consider, Mr. Chairman, human life as a system of expedients, whether viewed individually or collectively. Man, as an individual, is ever in the pursuit of happiness, and is particularly occupied in applying those expedients which, under existing circumstances, are most likely to produce it. These he varies according to the changes in his own mind, and the obstacles which continually occur against his plans. Every day presents some new evil to be avoided, or some new good to be obtained. He avoids the one and pursues the other, by the best means which the state of things will afford. To do this, he will vary his means, suspend or accelerate the execution of his plans, as circumstances dictate. At all times he must be the best judge of them, and of what, in any existing state of things, is necessary to his happiness. Man, also, is a various animal. Hence, the diversity of human character and human pursuits. Each individual takes a different route to happiness; and, being the best judge in his own case, has a right to do so.

Societies being the aggregates of individuals, are animated by the same principles. And, in the great Family of Nations, as among individuals in a state of Nature, each nation is the best judge of, and has a right to pursue, according to existing circumstances, those measures which it thinks necessary to its happiness. Every nation, therefore, has the capacity and the right, to form such a Government, and enact such laws, at every period of its existence, as the exigencies of its situation require. Of these it is the best judge, and no other nation has a right to interfere in the case. According to this principle, we have acted in the various changes that have taken place in our political institutions. Other nations, in all former ages, have exercised, and, in all future ages, will continue to exercise the same right.

As the circumstances of individuals are various, a mode of life which will produce one man's happiness, may produce another man's misery. The circumstances and dispositions of nations, are as various as the circumstances and dispositions of individuals; and, as among individuals, one mode of life, and one system of pursuits, will not produce every man's happiness; so, neither amongst nations, will one form of Government and one system of laws, suit every society. Hence, the diversity of Governments, which have existed in all countries, and in all ages. And hence, the revolutions and changes, which have been continually made in Governments and laws, as the exigencies of things required them.

From these principles, I deduce the following conclusions: 1st. That every nation has the capacity and the right, at every period of its existence, to provide for its happiness, according to its own knowledge of its situations and interests. 2d.

That, therefore, the probability is, that every nation, under the existing state of things, has that Government and those laws, which are best adapted to its manners, and most consonant with its circumstances.

I will exemplify these characters. We know that the Government of Turkey would not suit us—we do not know that our Government would suit the Turks. Leaving the Turks to judge for themselves, as we judge for ourselves, the presumption is, that they have a Government best suited to their manners and circumstances. We know we have a Government best suited to our circumstances and our manners.

I will not attempt to detail those circumstances, which have given rise to the variety of Governments, which now exist, and have existed in all the former ages of the world. On this subject, volumes have been written, and volumes might be written. I only mean to establish, that every nation, in every period of its existence, is the best judge of what is necessary to its happiness, and has those political institutions most adapted to its situation. This is a true Republican doctrine. It is founded on the capacity of the people to judge for themselves. We know that we have the capacity to judge for ourselves. We shall be proud and vain, indeed, if we deny to other nations the capacity to judge for themselves. We have the Government best suited to us; the presumption is, that other nations have Governments best suited to them.

Therefore, in discussing our relations to other nations, I do not see the propriety of introducing the nature and principles of their political institutions. On a question like the present, the only proper inquiry is, whether our intercourse with any nation, has a tendency to add to the comfort, the wealth, and the strength of the society; and not whether it has a tendency to alter and improve our social institutions; of these, the society in every period of its existence will always be the most competent judge. Viewing the principles I have stated, as irrefragable, being founded on the nature of man, the universal usage of nations, and our own practice, I will now turn my attention to some of the arguments which have been urged during the discussion. In the course of my observations, I may occasionally apply the principles which I have established. I shall not go into a detail of commercial facts. This has been fully done by persons more competent to the task. The Committee must be fully possessed of them. I shall only consider such observations as involve important principles.

My colleague, [Mr. Madison,] who introduced the resolutions, and he has been followed in the idea by every other gentleman who has spoken in support of them, said that the present Government originated from the incapacity of the Confederation, and of the individual States to regulate our commerce with foreign countries, and seemed to intimate that, to counteract the restrictions of Great Britain with regard to our trade was the principal inducement to its adoption. Though I disapprove of applying to any source but itself for the interpretation of an instrument which was intended, at all times, to be its own expositor, I will go back with my colleague to those scenes which preceded, and induced the establishment of the present Constitution. I shall go back with pleasure, because, being then in the infancy of my political life, I was witness to those first essays to regulate our commerce, which his patriotism induced him to make; and which finally terminated in the establishment of our present happy Government. I say, sir, I was witness to his exertions—not I only, Mr. Chairman, but all America, has been witness to his exertions. We all know the share he had in forming the present Constitution, and promoting its adoption. I know that the Convention at Annapolis, to regulate our trade, principally originated from him; I know that the grand Convention which formed our Constitution was the consequence of this, and originated from him. And, here, I cannot hesitate, as a member of a happy community, to pay that tribute of gratitude and thanks, which my heart has always felt to the man, whose counsels and exertions have been so instrumental to our happiness.

Mr. Chairman, while I agree with my colleague, that the first essays from which our Constitution arose had relation only to our trade; he will, I am sure, acknowledge that this was not the only object for which the grand Convention met, he will acknowledge that this is not the principal object contemplated by the Constitution. The power of regulating commerce is an inferior power vested with much more important powers in the Congress of the United States. But, sir, I need not make a comparison between the various powers of Congress. What does this sovereign act of the people declare to be their intention; I need only repeat their words:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

In these words, we see the sovereignty of the people exercised on one of those occasions which I have before stated in forming a Government, and we hear the purposes for which they formed it. It does not say that it was formed to regulate our commerce. The people had more important objects in view. I do not think, therefore, that so much stress ought to be laid on this idea, as gentlemen have been inclined to bestow on it.

But, having been induced to go back to the period which gave birth to our Constitution, I shall be excused, if, before I return to the present subject, I take a review of the then existing circumstances of the United States. We had then a Government condemned abroad, and despised at home, incapable of commanding the respect of foreign nations or the obedience of our own citizens. Its credit was sunk abroad and at home. Debts were accumulating in Europe and in America. Our commerce was almost annihilated, our agriculture languished, paper tenders existed in some States, the ties of confidence between man and man, and, consequently, the ties of morality were broken asunder; nay, animosities between the States began to prevail, instead of fraternal concord. Such was the situation of the United States, and to remedy these evils was the Constitution made. Has it not produced the intended effects? That it has, I need only appeal to the feelings of every fellow-citizen who hears me. I should, therefore, unnecessarily take up the time of the Committee in enumerating the various blessings which it has showered on our country. I will only mention the stimulus which our agriculture has received. In traveling through the various parts of the United States, I find fields, a few years ago, waste and uncultivated, filled with inhabitants, and covered with harvests; new habitations reared, contentment in every face, plenty on every board, confidence is restored, and every man is safe under his own vine and his own fig tree, and there is none to make him afraid. To produce this effect, was the intention of the Constitution, and not solely to regulate our trade, and it has succeeded. But I feel myself wandering from the subject.

The Committee will readily perceive that I have been led into my last observations, because, gentlemen have assigned, as an important reason in support of the resolutions, that the Constitution had been principally framed with a view to this object. I think I have shown that too much importance has been given to this idea.

I think my colleague also observed, that if the measures he had now proposed were not adopted at this time, after a new election, and a full representation of our fellow-citizens, he would despair of ever seeing them succeed; and I think he assigned this reason, and it gave me pain when he uttered it, that the subjects of Britain, in consequence of the interest they had in our trade and in our pecuniary institutions, would acquire a predominant influence over our public councils. This idea was more fully dilated upon by a gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FIDLEY.] The danger of this influence seemed to be the principal reason why he wished to lessen our commercial intercourse with Britain. The gentleman, perhaps, did not perceive the full extent of this observation. It wounds deeply, in my opinion, the Republican principle; and I am sure neither of them intended to do this. It goes to deny the competency of the people to govern themselves. It goes to assert that we are better judges of the future exigencies of the society than those who will live after us. The people, on former occasions have been found possessed of virtue and knowledge equal to the preservation of their liberties and interests. What right have we to say that, hereafter, they will be less wise and less virtuous? Let me again recur to former experience. At the commencement of our struggle with Britain, they certainly had all the commercial influence over us which the monopoly of our trade could give. What did it amount to? It neither damped our courage, nor checked our unanimity; and why suppose less virtue in our citizens now that we have become free, and enjoy the fruits of order and good Government, than when we existed in the Colonial dependence?

The same gentleman from Pennsylvania, and another of my colleagues, [Mr. Nicholas,] expatiated largely on the mischiefs of credit. My colleague, however, very justly and frankly acknowledged, that it was questionable how far Government had a right to interfere in the pecuniary concerns of individuals. But, whatever may be the mischiefs of credit, I do not think they will be prevented by sumptuary laws, or laws which may be calculated to operate that way; and I doubt the consistency of such laws with civil liberty. There is only one remedy which occurs to me—it is a proper administration of justice between man and man. Establish this; compel every individual to pay his debts: when this is done, the society will have no reason to limit his expenses, or to apprehend evil from his example. But this important part of social police belongs peculiarly to the State Governments; they have the only effectual means of preventing the mischiefs of credit and preserving the purity of morals. Congress have not the power of changing the municipal regulations or the judicial establishments of the respective States.

It has not been asserted, that our treaties of commerce have produced us any advantages as yet. Our principal and most beneficial intercourse, it has been proved, is with those nations with which we have no treaties. Our treaty with France has, in the course of the last year, operated to our injury in a two-fold degree. The asylum given to French privateers in our ports, has covered our coasts with them, and has therefore prevented the ships belonging to nations which are most accustomed to trade with us, and buying our surplus produce, notwithstanding the prodigious demand for part of it in Europe. I believe that, in the State of Virginia, this, perhaps combined with other causes, has produced an astonishing depression of the price of our tobacco and grain. In Europe, the only advantage which we had in return for these injuries, we have been deprived of; the treaty has there been violated by France, but every American will readily acknowledge, very properly violated, when he considers the necessity and imperious circumstances of the case.

Gentlemen have said, we ought to pass these resolutions to express our gratitude for services formerly rendered to us by the French nation. As to the virtues of generosity and gratitude, they are godlike attributes; they belong, I believe, more to heaven than to earth; they are rarely seen among individual men, and more rarely felt by nations; and it has been acknowledged, I think, in the National Convention itself, that the assistance we received was rendered, not so much for our sakes, as to weaken a dangerous and powerful rival. But, gentlemen have said, though we may not have derived any peculiar commercial advantages as yet from our intercourse with France, that we have every reason to expect the greatest advantages hereafter, from the fraternal regard expressed by their present Government to us, and the similarity of its principles to ours. If the French nation feels this friendly disposition towards us—and I verily believe they do, because they say they do—our Constitution has provided the means, by vesting adequate powers in the President and Senate, of meeting them on the ground of a new treaty, and I rely with full confidence on this subject, on the wisdom and patriotism of the Constitutional authority. But, sir, I do not think the gentlemen spoke accurately, when they mentioned the similarity of the principles of the present French Constitution to ours. But, supposing the resemblance existed—which, I shall presently show, does not—have we any reason to conclude, from the past history of nations, that such a resemblance necessarily begets friendship and cordiality? History exhibits the fact differently. Witness the wars between Carthage and Rome: the jealousies and wars between the different Republics of Greece: witness our own experience, the animosities which began to arise between the States, previous to the adoption of the present Government, and the difficulty of producing that adoption. The truth is, nations, in their intercourse with one another, regard nothing but their interest; hence the alliance so frequent between Commonwealths and Monarchies, more frequent than between Commonwealths themselves.

But, as peculiar emphasis is laid on the similarity of the principles of the French Government to the principles of ours, I will take the liberty of applying the principal traits of their Government to our situation. Their Republic is one and indivisible; our Republic consists of sovereign States, having extensive and important local jurisdictions, and a diversity of laws and interests. Does our Republic, then, resemble that of France, in this leading feature? Consolidation these States have ever deemed fatal to their liberties and happiness, and he would be deemed a traitor to his country who should propose to render our Republic one and indivisible. So jealous are the States on this head, that they have generally demanded an alteration in that part of the Constitution which subjects them to suits in the Courts of the United States, and the Senate has already sent, for our consideration, an amendment to that effect. The French Executive is plural; their Legislature is single. This idea is counter to the practice of almost all the States, and to the division of powers in our Constitution. Will any gentleman say that such a form of Government is suited to our ideas and our circumstances? Is every part of the United States in a situation to extend the idea of equality as far as it has been carried in France? I believe no gentleman will say it is. The conflagrations, the desolations, and the bloody scenes of St. Domingo, might also then be exhibited on our peaceful and happy plains.

Mr. Chairman, let not any gentleman misunderstand me; let not any gentleman suppose, when I show that there is no similarity between our Government and the French Constitution, that I mean to derogate from the wisdom of the latter. I only mean to prove that their Government is not like ours, and would not suit us. The French are a brave, a generous, and enlightened nation. They have performed the most brilliant achievements on the records of man; they have broken the chains of despotism; they have obliterated hierarchical and feudal tyranny; they have exercised that power which belongs to all nations, of establishing a Government suited to their own circumstances; they deserve to be happy under it, and I pray that they may be so. But, sir, as it has been so fashionable to bring into our view comparisons between different nations, I hope I shall be indulged when I compare the Governments of the States in America, to the British Government. If any similitude exists between the American Governments and foreign Governments, the resemblance most strongly relates to the British Government. Their Executive is single, their Legislature is divided into two Houses. Such are generally the outlines of our Governments; we have only improved on the British model, by rendering our public functionaries more responsible to the people. We have abolished feudal rights, we have abolished perpetuities; and there is no remnant of the ancient system of things among us, except that, in some States, lands are unjustly exempted from the payment of debts. To be sure, every part of a man's property should answer his obligations; the law of reason and the law of morality require it: and soon, I hope, that this stain on American principles will be forever removed.

When I state these facts—and I think they cannot be denied—I do not mean to justify the conduct of the Cabinet of Britain. I feel resentment as strong as any other gentleman for the retention of the Western posts. I suspect them of unfriendly offices, both with regard to our Indian war, and with regard to the depredations committed on our trade by the Algerine corsairs. But I am not sent here to indulge, at all hazards, my resentments; but to provide for the welfare of my country, in the best manner that circumstances will permit. I shall be ready to join gentlemen in any measures to bring Great Britain to an explanation of all the injuries which we may suppose we have received from her. If she refuses to do us justice, we may then, and it will then be time enough to determine on the measures proper to be pursued. We have always ample means of redress within our power, without resorting to the proposed measures.

But, sir, dismissing our resentment against the Cabinet of Britain—separating the people from the Court, the community from the Administration—let us dispassionately look back on their history. Caesar and Tacitus, in the ages in which they lived, tell us that this people had a high sense and were ever jealous of their liberties. Coming down to periods more within our knowledge, we find them struggling with, and gradually shaking off the ecclesiastic and feudal tyranny, which had overwhelmed the rest of Europe. Little more than a century ago, we see them bringing one tyrant to the scaffold, and banishing another. In this little corner of the globe alone, in the dark ages of the world, when ignorance, superstition, and oppression, had enveloped Asia, Africa, and Europe, the flame of liberty was kept alive. To them we are indebted for our knowledge of civil rights and civil liberty, and the institutions most favorable to them. From them we derive the foundations of our laws; from them both we and the French have derived the inestimable trial by jury. The forefathers of New England, (who have established in that country the wisest institutions, for the perpetuation of human liberty, and human happiness, which the world has ever seen,) driven away by the then existing tyranny of England, brought with them that flame which has animated and illuminated the gloomy forests of America, and spread from thence a beam of light to France. Every generous American will excuse me, I am sure, when I do not permit my sentiments to the Cabinet of Britain to destroy altogether my respect for a people who were the champions of liberty, when no other champions existed, and who, I hope, will never consent to be slaves.

I have taken up much time of the Committee; much remains to be said; I will, however, add but little. It would be a copious subject to inquire into the capacity of different countries to supply themselves with those articles which the United States are most capable of furnishing. Also, what new sources of supply might be opened to Great Britain, if we stopped our intercourse with her; and, in that case, what other countries will be in a capacity to buy what we can spare, or furnish us with what we may want. We do not know what new countries may be improved, nor how far the old may be inclined to turn their attention to agriculture. This subject involves the whole economy of nations; perhaps it surpasses the knowledge of any gentleman to develop it. I confess that I am wholly incompetent to the task. May it not, therefore, be the wisest policy of the nation, which is in its infancy, in strength, in arts, and manufactures, to leave things in that course in which the existing circumstances of the world have placed them, and which continually adds to its prosperity? It is certain that, within four years past, our manufactures and navigation have increased prodigiously, under the existing system of commerce. Our coasting trade, being secured to our citizens, is operating rapidly to increase American seamen and American tonnage. If the present state of union and prosperity continues, this will be a continually increasing and powerful nursery of shipping and of seamen. I believe that it is a fact, that the intercourse of the different parts of Great Britain with each other, is regarded in that country as a more important nursery of seamen than all their foreign commerce. This certainly depends very much on their coal trade; and when coal becomes a common fuel among us, we have the same means of increasing our shipping and seamen.

It is certainly worthy of inquiry, whether it be wise to divert the attention of our citizens from agriculture to other pursuits? Whether agriculture be not the employment most favorable to the virtue and morality; and, consequently, to the happiness and stability of society? And whether agriculture, in the present state of the world, be not the most profitable as well as the most happy pursuit for American citizens? It is worthy of inquiry, whether the protection of Great Britain from invasion and subjugation, depending on her maritime force, it can be expected that she will relax her Navigation Act, which alone supports and cherishes the means of her safety, and whether it ought to be expected? It is worthy of inquiry, in case she should counteract the proposed regulations, whether war may not be the consequence, our revenue be destroyed, and with these our public credit and our agriculture; nay, our Government itself? On these subjects, though important and copious in the extreme, I will not enlarge.

At least, before we enter into measures which may endanger our peace and our revenue, we ought to provide the means of defence, and to insure to every person, by the provision of ample funds, the property which the laws have guaranteed to him. Until gentlemen shall propose some effectual measure of this sort, it will be highly improper to hazard the safety and credit of our Government on the contingencies of experiments. One truth I know: that, in the present course of things, we may enjoy a greater share of prosperity than ever fell to the lot of any other people. I know, also, that strong as nature has made us on the defensive—humble and painful as the idea may be to some—compared with the nations of Europe, we are but an atom in point of strength, in European politics. I see, too, Europe convulsed to its foundations, and furnishing no certain clue to guide our conduct. I see America, at the same time, rapidly increasing in wealth and strength. Under such circumstances and such impressions, it is my duty to oppose the resolutions under consideration. Permit me to add a word concerning myself: I am a farmer; I derive only a competence from the tillage of the earth; I can, therefore, have no interest distinct from that of the society.

Mr. SWANSE rose to take some notice of a few observations which had fallen from the gentleman last up, [Mr. LEZ.] That gentleman (he said) had laid down a set of principles on which he founded his argument. He had said that every society had a right to form the Government which they conceived best suited to their circumstances. Granted; and, also, that every Government that exists is the best for the people governed by it; this he could not agree to.

[Here Mr. LEZ interrupted Mr. SWANSE to explain. He stated that his assertion was, that, as we claim a right to choose our own Government, we ought not to deny to other nations the same right, and ought to presume that every nation has that best suited to its particular situation, of which each is the best judge.]

Mr. SWANSE continued, by inquiring how it is possible for nations groaning under all the fetters of despotism, awed by standing armies, and wasted by taxation, to choose the Government which they might believe best suited to them. The gentleman did not fear the influence of a nation holding considerable interest in our funds; the generally approved maxim, that the borrower is a servant to the lender, however, is a strong ground for that fear. He was surprised, he owned, that the gentleman should attempt a comparison between our Government and that of Great Britain, and assert that there is a strong resemblance.

Great Britain has no Constitution but the will of the Legislature; in this respect a radical difference exists. He confessed he was surprised to hear the eulogium on the British nation that had just fallen from that gentleman. Caesar and Tacitus had been quoted to prove that they were lovers of liberty. The Germans, at the time alluded to, also had some notions of liberty; and now, he believed, they could not be called patterns for freedom. The execution of Charles I. was also mentioned to show their passion for liberty; but has not the 30th of January obtained a place in their calendar? There was a time when England could boast a band of patriots, but they were crushed by tyranny; our forefathers fled from that tyranny, from that country, now extolled as the fairest seat of that heavenly goddess, Liberty. There was a time, he repeated, when that country could boast a spark of the flame; but then they selfishly wished to keep it to themselves. Were they lovers of liberty when they insisted upon legislating for this Continent? Have they shown themselves lovers of liberty and justice by breaking our treaty, by withholding our posts, seizing our ships, attempting to starve France, by infringing the Law of Nations, in preventing our vessels from carrying thither provisions, exciting the Indians to murder us, letting loose the Algerines upon us? These are their deeds, and this is the nation we are called upon to love.

Mr. LEZ rose to set the gentleman right. He did not say that our Governments are like that of Great Britain, but only that they are more like it, in form, than like that of France. He said expressly, that we had improved on the British model, by abolishing feudal tenures and perpetuities, and by rendering the public functionaries more responsible to the people. He did not hold Great Britain up as a pattern; yet who can say that they were not the freest nation in Europe before the French revolution? He advocated the principle of letting every nation judge for itself, and not attempt Quixotically to liberate the world. If a nation has not energy to become free, they deserve to be slaves. When ripe for freedom, they will soon burst their chains asunder. France, from the depths of despotism, had sprung into freedom, without extraneous assistance, and so will the Turks when ripe for its enjoyment.

Mr. MOORE next arose, and expressed himself as follows:

If an apology is necessary from any member of this House, it is from me. I am sure none have less knowledge of commerce. My principal object in rising is to answer some of the arguments used by my colleague. He has set out with stating that every nation has a right to make such regulations as will promote their own interest. It is true, but does it follow that we are to adopt such only as will suit us, were we wholly unconnected with Great Britain? If their regulations operate against us, shall we not counteract them? And shall we continue to suffer the injury, under the idea that, as a nation they have the right to pursue their interest? He has stated an observation made by a gentleman from Virginia, that the credit obtained in Great Britain might influence our councils. This, he says, is supposing they will have less integrity than ourselves. Sir, our importing merchant obtaining a credit, his selling on credit to the merchants in the country, they retailing to the citizens on credit, may form such a connexion of dependency as may be injurious. Whatever may be the natural integrity of men, they are imperceptibly led to favor their own interest. Under such circumstances, I should not willingly trust myself; I am not disposed to trust others. But the argument was only intended to show that the credit our merchants obtained in Britain was not to our advantage. He has drawn comparisons between the French and British and our Constitutions. It is enough for us, that the French Constitution has liberty for its basis. From such a source we have a right to expect justice and reciprocity in our commerce. They have already manifested a disposition to enter into regulations founded on those principles. The reasonings on this question I do not well understand. They no doubt have their force. I am obliged, in making up my mind, to take more familiar reasonings for my guide, not understanding the comprehensive view gentlemen have taken of the subject. I do not think that the comparison drawn between our and the French Constitution, or the comparison drawn between the restrictions and advantages between France and Great Britain, will warrant any conclusion for or against the proposition. If we have made a commercial treaty with France that is unfavorable and operates to our disadvantage, it is no reason. It lays us under no obligation to submit to regulations adopted by any other nation which are injurious. Having made a Commercial Treaty with France, we are bound to observe it.

If the reasoning founded on Britain's granting us equal privileges and advantages with France should prevent us asking more of Britain, it would prove too much. It would prove that we should never demand an advantageous or favorable Treaty of Commerce, having once made an unfavorable one; that making an unfortunate Treaty gives a claim to all other nations.

I have formed my opinion on this present question, not by comparing the advantages and disadvantages of our trade, as they are regulated by different nations, but by inquiring what is the state of our commerce with particular nations; and whether, from our commercial relation, we have not a right to expect more favorable regulations? Whether we have not a right to expect the removal of restrictions to which we are subject, and to obtain advantages we do not now receive? We have been informed that Britain is dependent on us for many of the necessities of life. They are dependent on us for those raw materials by which numbers of their citizens receive employment, and which cannot be obtained from any other quarter. If this is a true state of the case, and it has not been controverted, and the truth of it, I think, is evident, from a view of exports to that country, have we not a right to expect, a right to claim, a removal of those unfavorable restrictions? If this is a true state of our commerce, would not Britain, were all the regulations on the footing of reciprocity, have the advantage? Their trade with us is of necessity; theirs to us may be, and can be, dispensed with. Numbers of them depend on us for their very subsistence. Independent of their manufactures, we can go on and, I believe, prosper. I do not believe that agriculture or manufactures would sustain even a check. It would, no doubt, be some degree of inconvenience to the mercantile interest; and I cannot help observing, that gentlemen have been loud on the disadvantages of the merchants from the adoption of the principle now under discussion. I must regard the merchant only as an intermediate negotiator between the planter and manufacturer and the foreign merchant. I do not conceive the loss is sustained by the merchant. It is sustained by every citizen in proportion to his consumption. If the interest of agriculture is promoted, the mercantile interest must participate. I consider the agricultural interest as the source, and cannot agree that the mercantile should either be the first or only object of our attention. And suppose a temporary inconvenience to arise from the adoption of the resolutions, I think they ought to be adopted when intended, and I think it is evident to any person who will contemplate the degree in which Great Britain is dependent on the United States for her exports, that they will be productive of lasting advantages. Is there a probability of our being relieved otherwise than by our own exertions? Or can gentlemen fix the boundary beyond which they will not go, in their restrictions, should we continue to acquiesce? I confess I expect nothing short of the entire profits of all our labor will satisfy them. If we are to judge of the future by the past, and I do not think we have a right to suppose a change in her motives or principles, we are to expect regulations which will throw into the pockets of her citizens all the profits of the labor of the United States.

Gentlemen confess her Navigation Act operates against us. But it is said she treats us as she does all other nations, which, to me, I confess, is no reason we should suffer injustice. Yet not contented with the restrictions on our trade, we have it in proof she had a principal and unsolicited agency in the late truce, whereby our vessels are subjected to depredations and to being captured. I will not say what was their principal motive, but it is another means of throwing into their hands an additional portion of our carrying trade. They condemn as prize goods carrying to the ports of France. Our vessels are seized, searched, and detained unnecessarily. This conduct has constrained the French, in their own defence, to adopt similar regulations. All of which is confessedly against the Law of Nations. Their forcing or enticing our seamen on board their vessels, is calculated to increase their shipping by excluding ours. And this done, whilst we were leaving trade to regulate itself, whilst we were tamely submitting to their restrictions.

Under these circumstances, we have no reason to hope for a favorable change. I think the most distant hope cannot be entertained. No alternative remains but an entire acquiescence, or availing ourselves of the peculiarly favorable circumstances of our commercial relations, to enforce justice. This may be deemed unjust or unequal amongst nations; I am sure it would not amongst individuals. He who, in merchandizing, is exchanging a necessary of life to the person who needs, and could not be supplied from any other quarter, for property of inferior demand, would not submit to have the terms of exchange dictated to him. He would avail himself of circumstances to enforce justice or refuse the exchange. Why we should not, as a nation, assume a similar conduct, I know not.

Counter regulations are apprehended. I wish the gentleman had pointed out what regulations they can adopt which will not operate more against them than us. I believe it cannot be done. War is also apprehended. It has not before been suggested. I believe it is not seriously apprehended. As an independent nation, can our doing what Great Britain has done before us—can our doing what we have a right to do as an independent nation, give offence? If this should be made the cause of war, we may rest assured it was pre-determined, and that nothing we could do would prevent it. I believe the only way to cause a war is by tame submission, and to prevent it, is to use our rights, uninfluenced by a fear either of counter-regulations or war.

It was then moved to adjourn the Committee. Mr. W. SMITH wished to speak to the resolutions. But Mr. CLARK observed, that the time of the Committee was pretty far spent, and he believed the gentleman would go into the subject at considerable length. He would therefore submit whether it was not better to defer the observations, and let the Committee rise. The Committee then rose, the Chairman reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. BEARRY, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States, reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time.

FRENCH VESSELS.

It was then moved that the House should take into consideration the report on the case of certain French vessels which have come into the harbors of the United States from St. Domingo, and had requested an exemption from the common tonnage duties.

Mr. S. SMITH said that we had no right to take such duties. They amounted to fifteen thousand dollars; but, if it was an hundred thousand, he would give it all back again.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was of opinion that we had as good a right to the tonnage of these vessels as of any others. He would grant the desire of the petitioners, not as a matter of justice, but of expediency and humanity. Many of these vessels had brought with them valuable cargoes, which were sold in this country. Several of the ships themselves had since been rotting in our ports, to the great loss of the owners. They could not take away any of the produce of this country. The House now adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 23.

An engrossed bill for completing and better supporting the Military Establishment of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself again into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Resolutions proposed by Mr. MADISON.

Mr. DEXTER opened the debate. He said, that it was somewhat singular to observe, that the members from the Eastern States were generally opposed to the resolutions, though it was commonly understood that these States would reap some advantages from the adoption of them: and, on the other hand, that the members from the Southern States were, for the most part, in favor of the resolutions, though it was expected that their constituents were to suffer by them. There could not be a more striking evidence, that the opposition of the Eastern members originated in the purest and most honorable motives, than their thus rejecting the prospect of benefit. It was needless, he thought, to introduce other nations into this discussion besides Britain and America, since the question in fact regarded them only. Retaliation for the injuries committed by Britain had been recommended. But, if she did not treat us worse than she treated other nations, why should we retaliate on her, when there was no particular discrimination against America? If, by embracing these resolutions, there was a prospect of improving the manufactures and navigation of the United States, he should be happy to support them. But if, upon discussion, it were to appear that they would answer no such end, it certainly could not be regarded as a mark of the want of patriotism to oppose them. He could not see what advantage America was to reap by restricting the navigation and manufactures of one foreign nation, merely to favor those of another. If we buy British manufactures because they are cheapest, to make resolutions which would force us to buy manufactures that are dearer, is in reality a tax. The resolutions tended that way. He could not discover, upon inquiry, those unjust regulations which Britain was said to have established against the commerce and shipping of America. If other nations have not seen it proper to retaliate, why should we? If attempts of this nature have been made without success in Europe, can we hope to succeed? Where is the commercial distinction made against America by Britain, in favor of the other commercial nations of the earth? There is none. Before we try to punish another country for laying restrictions upon our trade, we ought to look into our own conduct, and see whether such a country might not, with equal reason, blame us? Justice, like charity, should begin at home. There was a resemblance between the natural and political body. As the former frequently suffered from bold experiments to cure it of a disorder, so the latter had been often injured by precipitate endeavors to remove its evils. He doubted whether the present situation of America required an energetic or violent interference of the Legislature to secure its welfare. We cannot forestall the growth of nature, or, by forcing our political body to take too much food, bring on manhood before its proper time. The period of maturity will arrive; but let us in the mean time be contented. We are as happy as perhaps we ever shall be. If the balance of trade be against us, it does not follow that we are losers by it. The balance against us is a Foreign Loan, expended for the improvement of agriculture, and by which we are gaining, perhaps, an hundred per cent. It is said that Britain lays taxes upon American trade and shipping. But this is only for the purpose of raising a revenue, and not for the professed design to injure the United States. As to the carrying trade, we shall never grow rich by that; but it deserves to be cultivated, for the sake of improving our maritime strength. It was worth while for poor nations to court it, but it could never be an object with a country like America. We are able to do much better; and we have no business to stretch out in that way. No man could read the resolutions, and say, that they are intended for that purpose. They are plainly levelled against Britain. It had been stated, that the total manufactures of Britain extended to fifty-one or fifty-two millions sterling. Of this, America took off two millions. Four per cent. was but a trifle, in the manufactures of Britain, and could not be supposed to influence her conduct. A member [Mr. CLARK] had said the other day, that in consequence of the alarm spread by our non-importation agreement, the stamp-act had formerly been repealed by Britain. The gentleman certainly knew, that there were much more weighty causes for rescinding that act. It was vain to think that we should be able to prevent the importation of British manufactures into this country. They would be sent to us through France. It was not easy to starve the British nation. It had been said, that they depended upon America for the raw materials of some of their manufactures. But in case we quarrelled with them, it was possible that they would be able to find means for raising raw materials at home, and this might be productive of many bad consequences to America. Retaliation was greatly to be apprehended. It had yesterday been asked, with great confidence, by a gentleman, in what way Britain could hurt America? It might be done in many ways: she might do it by tonnage duty, and by discriminating duties. That Britain had it in her power to retaliate, nobody could doubt. The people of that country are as angry at us as we are at them, in regard to commercial restrictions. When the bond of interest is once broken, it is easy to get into a war. As to piracies committed on our ships, Mr. D. said, that he felt for the prostrate honor of his country, but this is not the proper season to retaliate. It had been said, that the proposed resolutions would force Britain to enter into a Commercial Treaty with us. He had great doubts about the benefits derived from such transactions. Though he must oppose the resolutions, he had no predilection for Britain; and he felt most sensibly her injuries to America.

Mr. CLARK conceived himself alluded to, as having said that we might force Britain into a Commercial Treaty. No, sir, (said Mr. C.) before we make a new treaty, let them execute the last that they made with us, by giving up the Western posts.

Mr. DEXTER replied, that he never had meant to refer to the member as having said so. He made a general answer to such observations as he had heard from any part of the House. He had only referred to Mr. CLARK in regard to the stamp-act.

Mr. MADISON next rose in reply to some remarks made by Mr. DEXTER. He said, that he wondered how gentlemen could suppose that to be war on the table. Did they suppose Britain so unwise or so unjust as to declare a war? Every consideration of interest must prevent it. He hoped that we did not now deliberate as a Colony, but as an independent people, whose measures were not to be dictated by any other Powers. What could Britain gain by a contest? Would war employ her starving manufacturers? Would war furnish provisions to her West India Islands, which in that case must also starve? Would war give employment to the vessels that had formerly imported luxuries to America? Were Britain to declare war, he could give no name equal to her folly. She would plunge herself ten times deeper in the difficulties that she wanted to avoid. Every counter-regulation would be a stroke against herself.

Mr. ARES spoke a few words on the impropriety of making an accusation against Britain, without advancing specific facts and specific evidence to support them.

Mr. GILES commenced his remarks by observing that, if an apology had been deemed necessary from the nature of the subject, and the vote he proposed to give upon it, it was rendered more so from the eloquence displayed by the gentleman who had just preceded him, [Mr. DEXTER, of Massachusetts.] The gentleman has done ample justice to one side of the subject, and he was sensible the opposite side, in his hands, would suffer by the comparison. He proposed under his present impressions to vote for the general proposition, and such of the resolutions in detail as would carry the general principle into full effect.

These measures contemplate considerable innovations in the existing state of the commerce of the United States. He had anticipated the gentleman last up, in the reflection that extensive innovations into existing systems ought to be adopted with caution. Calculations upon which they are founded, should be adjusted to the magnitude of the expected object, and the probable efficacy of the means proposed to be used for its attainment.

Hence he readily admitted, that strong reasons in favor of the proposed measures ought to be expected before their adoption; and any possible hazard of their results ought to be amply compensated, for the importance of the end to be attained.

He observed, there was another circumstance which justified an apology. The mercantile interest of the United States will be the most immediately affected in their occupations by the proposed measures, and the gentlemen of this House, from this scene of business, seem most to doubt their expediency.

We have been told, with emphasis, of the intelligence and patriotism of the merchants of America, and it is admitted that the truth has not been exceeded. The merchants deserve great credit for their conduct since the existence of the present Government; and their opinions upon this subject ought to produce additional caution.

It should be remarked, however, that merchants, like all other descriptions of men, are influenced in some degree by existing connexions, formed habits, and consequent prejudices; they recoil from any possible interruption in the usual course of their business.

They magnify every hazard arising from a change in the direction of their employment, into certain and positive loss. Although, therefore, their opinions ought to have weight and produce caution, yet they ought not to command a decision from others, unattended with conviction. For if those of the Committee, not of this description, be compelled to decide upon the present question from extraneous mercantile indications, without requiring convictions from their reasonings, there are indications of the mercantile scene on the other side the Atlantic, operating in commendation of the propositions with as much force as those on this side the Atlantic, in opposition to them. It is remarkable that this whole description of men are actively opposed to the passage of the proposed measures. Their sensations upon this subject have been evidenced by their anxious attendance upon the progress of the matter. If the propositions should eventuate in a national commercial conflict, the inference in general might be made, that what it is their interest to prevent it is our interest to enact. The British Court are equally sensitive upon this subject. They have at several periods manifested their alarms. It may be concluded that these sensations have arisen from the opinion that the effects of the propositions will be such as are calculated upon by the favorers of them. He was unwilling, however, to hazard a vote upon any extraneous circumstances, and should look into the merits of the question.

He felt that some apology was due to the State and district whose immediate representative he was. Virginia is an exporting State, without vessels, and without a mercantile capital, equal to the employment afforded to capital. The town of Petersburg exports much in value and much in bulk; the surrounding country grows these articles; vessels and capital are wanting for the exportation of this produce. Hence the proposed measures will be particularly felt for some time by this part of the United States.

He relied, however, with confidence on the virtue and patriotism of the people, and should act from a belief that they would even rejoice in a temporary inconvenience with a view to permanent good; and that their joy would not be diminished by the recollection that the temporary ill which they may sustain would produce a temporary advantage to their Eastern brethren, without excluding them from a full participation in the permanent good to be expected.

He remarked, that he felt the more diffidence upon this subject, since he frankly acknowledged that he did not possess an accurate knowledge of the details of commerce, and did not propose to make any material addition to the stock of mercantile information now before the Committee. He proposed to use the facts furnished by other gentlemen, and acknowledged an obligation for the information they contain. He proposed to consider the subject, in the various shapes it had assumed since the commencement of the discussion, and to state the results which had been formed in his own mind. In making the attempt, general principles will be resorted to, and minute arithmetical calculations as much as possible avoided.

The gentleman who first favored the Committee with his remarks, [Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina,] admonished them of the propriety of separating political from commercial considerations in the course of discussion. If this rule had been rigidly enforced, he remarked that perhaps three-fourths of the impressions made upon his mind favorable to the propositions, would have been lopped off without consideration. He could not conceive for what cause the political should be separated from the commercial part of the subject. The propositions may eventuate in a change in the direction of the business of one whole occupation in society; a change of the disposition of the nation, in so important a point, must have a very interesting political aspect, as it relates to the Government internally. The present subject exhibits an important political feature, as it relates to the external connexions of the Government with foreign nations. If, therefore, it should be observed as a rule to pass upon this subject, by excluding from view all the political considerations connected with it, the rule would include an essential omission of duty. The gentleman himself, however, in the next sentence, furnished an example of the violation of the precept he had just prescribed, by calling the attention of the Committee to the political situation of the United States, at this delicate crisis, and urging this circumstance as one reason against the adoption of the propositions. The gentleman then proceeded to present the subject in two points of view. The one, the relative conduct of France and Great Britain towards the United States; the other, the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States, comparatively with other foreign nations. To present the subject in the first point of view, the gentleman furnished an anonymous table, calculated to a date anterior to the commencement of the late revolution in France. As the only history of this table, with which the Committee have been favored, was that it was the compilation of a gentleman of considerable mercantile information, it is presumed the gentleman will not be surprised if it should be deemed to be of doubtful authority; the rather as it was the ground of a severe and unmerited censure of the gentleman whose report is now under consideration, and who it is believed would not suffer in a comparison, in point of intelligence, accuracy, or patriotism, either with the laborious compiler of the table, or with the gentleman who has been judiciously selected for its interpreter.

He remarked, that the table bore upon the face of it evident marks of partiality, and instead of having them effaced, they were aggravated by the commentator.

One irresistible evidence of the partiality of the table, consists in asserting that American flour is free to the British West Indies, and excluding from view the absolute monopoly of the carriage, and the monopoly of contracts for returns.

It is presumed that the gentleman, at least, cannot except to this criticism on the table, because one of his chief censures against the gentleman whose report is before the Committee, which was even carried so far as to infer improper motives, arose from a suggested omission in the report, which will be found upon examination to be wholly immaterial. An evident partiality is observable in the interpreter of the table, in an earnest attempt to establish this principle: that prohibitory duties on flour in Great Britain afforded an equal encouragement of the article by commercial regulations, with a free importation into France, or at least with a duty admitted by the gentleman to be too trifling to be counted. The commercial arrangements of France in this particular, leave this article upon the true ground of competition in the growth of the article; this ground of competition is destroyed in Great Britain by commercial restrictions. In the one case, competition in the market is all that could be reasonably expected, and that is granted; in the other case, competition would be alike desirable, and there it is provisionarily excluded.

Another evidence of the partiality of the interpreter of the table consists in the zealous attempt to establish it as a principle, that 1s. 8d. sterling duty upon tobacco per lb. is no discouragement to the growth of that article; this idea was grounded upon the suggestion, that the consumption is not thereby lessened, no substitute being afforded for it in Great Britain. Tobacco does not average to the exporter two pence sterling per pound. The duty is at least seven times as great as the prime cost of the article. The great consumption of this article is by the poorer order of the people. The state of society is such in Britain at present, that hard labor during a whole year will hardly afford a scanty subsistence to the laborer; hence necessity compels this description of persons to economize in the use of the article, or to avoid the use of it altogether; of course, the consumption is materially lessened, and the growth of the article is discouraged from the operation of the duty. The gentleman founded his fierce attack against the gentleman whose report is now under consideration, for omitting to insert in his report that there was a higher duty imposed by Great Britain upon all other foreign tobacco than that of the United States, and hence inferred a friendly disposition from Great Britain to the United States. The insertion of the fact would have added to the bulk of the report, but could convey no additional useful information.

It is known that the high duties imposed upon all foreign tobaccos, took its rise during the Colonial existence of these States; it is known that it has not been altered since their independence; it is known that the tobaccos of the United States are furnished at so much cheaper rates than those of any other country, that there would be no danger of competition if the duties in Britain were the same on each. It is likewise known that the United States furnished a sufficient, a redundant supply for the consumption of all Europe; hence Great Britain has not thought proper since the Revolution to destroy this relic of Colonial regulations, not because she wished to favor us, but because she would not thereby have benefited herself; hence, too, the omission of this information could not be material, and the insertion of it would only have served to contradict the inference endeavored to be established, of the favorable disposition of Great Britain towards the United States.

There is one manifest impropriety in confining our inquiries to the date prescribed by the gentleman for this table; it would involve the absurd consequence of adjusting our laws to a retrospective, instead of a progressive state of things. It would be as ridiculous as an attempt by law to prescribe rules for the proper deportment of the ghosts of our forefathers. It is to be hoped that the date could not have been fixed upon from a wish that the United States should indirectly furnish a countenance for the restoration of despotism; and it was matter of regret that the gentleman should openly avow a distrust of the permanency of the French Revolution as one motive for the conduct.

Mr. G. remarked, that he hoped the permanency of the Revolution of France was as much greater than the permanency of the ancient despotism of France, as the great fabric of nature, to the petty plastic productions of art.

Here Mr. SMITH rose to explain: He said he had pursued a principle adopted by Mr. JEFFERSON in his Report. He read a passage from the Report, from which it appeared that the Report had been calculated to the Summer of 1792.

Mr. GILES replied, that the principle was just reversed; the one had reference to a state of things posterior to the Revolution; the other, anterior to the commencement of it, during the existence of the ancient despotism.

If the table were to have any influence, it must arise from stating the real relative dispositions of France and Great Britain towards the United States; but, if the epoch to which it relates is to govern, it will exclude some of the strongest testimonies of the inimical temper of Great Britain, and of the friendly temper of France.

Are these considerations to have less weight, or to be wholly excluded from the view, because they are more recent? Is it because we are now laboring under these aggressions, and from some late despatches, likely to continue, so that a remedy is to be withheld? He thought not; and therefore should proceed to state some of the evidences of the dispositions of the two nations, displayed since the epoch alluded to.

Great Britain has subjected our vessels, upon the high sea, to seizure and search, and exempted those of Sweden and Denmark. He wished to press this fact upon the gentleman who preceded him, because he had denied that Great Britain had made any discriminations amongst foreign nations injurious to the United States.

Great Britain has invaded our vessels on the high seas, and refused them the protection of French property. This is an acknowledged violation of the laws of nations; at least of the last Convention of Nations upon the subject.

Great Britain has prevented our vessels from conveying to our friend and ally goods not contraband, and compelled them to make sales to herself or some of her allies.

Great Britain has compelled our vessels to deviate their courses, and, to their great hazard and loss, detained them for trial upon frivolous pretences.

Our vessels have been subjected, in her Courts, to the danger of subornation to precarious and uncertain testimony.

Great Britain has been the instrument of letting loose the pirates of the Barbary States upon our commerce. This fact, however doubted upon the first report, is placed beyond doubt by the late conduct of Portugal towards our vessels in her ports.

Are these facts denied? If not, do they not operate directly and specifically upon our commerce? Is it not astonishing, after all these facts are known, and often repeated, that gentlemen should be heard to inquire, what injuries have we received from Great Britain, and to infer that the United States are equally favored with other nations? In addition to these things, Great Britain has observed the most rigid silence upon the subject of friendly commercial arrangements. The gentleman who preceded him, doubted her indisposition for a treaty; silence is a refusal to act; a refusal to act is a denial. The late despatches do not furnish the most distant hope of a change of disposition in this respect.

France, on the other hand, has offered a renewal of the existing commercial treaty upon the most liberal policy.

It has been asked, in the tone of sarcastic triumph, and from so many quarters of the Committee, as to give it the air of previous concert, What advantages have the United States received from the French treaty? The question is answered by recurrence to the date of its existence, it is dated in February, 1778! It acknowledged our right to trade as a nation! It was the first act of our national sovereignty, acknowledged by a great and powerful nation.

Americans at that day deemed it no inconsiderable boon, and this is the first time Americans have ever questioned it. If a prophet, in 1778, had foretold that, in 1794, this question should have been triumphantly put in an American Congress, would he not have been deemed a visionary, and would he not have been deemed an imputation upon the American character? Yet, so strange a prophecy would have been realized! But, let it be supposed that the treaty be a disadvantageous one to the United States; how would the admission affect the present question? France seems to have admitted that the treaty does not embrace all the advantages arising from the mutual intercourse of the two nations, and has proposed to liberalize the terms. The disadvantages of the treaty have been suggested.

It should be recollected that the circumstance of inconvenience alluded to, depended upon a contingency—it first happened to France. It might, however, first have happened to the United States; and if the United States had been engaged in a war, and France neutral, the inconvenience complained of would have been reversed.

The incompatibility of the mercantile interest with the success of the French cause, in the present state of commerce, is a circumstance to be regretted, since it has, perhaps, produced more disaffection in the American mind than any other cause. In this part of the subject, a tart old adage has been quoted and repeated as a proper rule of conduct: "No friendship in trade." It is presumed that this maxim can never be extended to mean, that it is better to trade with an enemy than a friend. It would be deemed an act of folly in an individual to prefer an enemy for a customer, to a friend; particularly if he knew that the enemy would cut his throat, or rob him of his purse the first opportunity which might occur, and thus deprive him totally of the means of trade—the remark applies more strongly to nations; because they are not subject to municipal restraints; their power and their will are only to be consulted. The friendship of a nation, particularly a great nation, is intrinsically a matter of value. It becomes an important item of calculation when it is founded upon interest. This is the case between the United States and France at this moment. It is the interest of France, that the United States should continue a Republican form of Government. It is the interest, it is, perhaps, the salvation of the United States, that France should establish and preserve a Republican form of Government. He was, therefore, of opinion, that the favorable disposition of France, towards the United States, grounded upon interest, is a thing of material value, and ought to be taken into calculation, even under the rigid maxim prescribed.

A gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEE.] to avoid the force of these considerations, had remarked that there was a greater similarity in the Government of the United States, to that of Great Britain, than to that of France. He remarked, that the French Republic was one and indivisible; that the Government of the United States was a confederated Republic. This constitutes no essential difference in the fundamental principle of the two Governments; the foundation of both is, the consent of the people; the pursuit of both is, the equality of rights. The British Government, he remarked, was composed of three branches, as was that of the United States. It should be remarked, that they differed essentially in the component materials; coercion and not the consent of the people, is the foundation of the British Government. Its pursuit, a monopoly, and not an equality of rights. He would dismiss this part of the subject, by concluding that, so far as the relative dispositions of France and Britain may affect the subject, every fair consideration deducible therefrom, operates, conclusively, in favor of the propositions.

The second point in view, in which this subject has been presented to the Committee, is, the conduct of Great Britain, towards the United States, comparatively with foreign nations. He did not think this at all interesting to the United States; and was surprised, that the gentleman who just preceded him, should have renewed and relied so much upon it. It cannot be material to us, that Great Britain should impose the same terms, upon all other nations, which she imposes upon the United States; provided they be alike injurious and dishonorable to all. It is a poor consolation, that, whilst the United States are in a state of commercial bondage, all other nations, except one, should be equally so. In the commercial world, Great Britain has assumed the position of the dominant nation; but she is indebted to the acquiescence of other nations, more than to her own energy, for the enjoyment of it.

The United States ought not to wait for an example from other nations. They ought to convince the world of nations, that they understand their own rights, as a nation; and possess spirit and ability to assert and enforce them.

He would, therefore, dismiss this part of the subject, without further comment, and proceed to consider it in a more interesting feature; as it respects the commercial intercourse directly between the United States and Great Britain.

The true grounds upon which the subject ought to be considered, are the following:

Whether, in the existing state of things, the United States do reciprocate with Great Britain the commercial advantages arising from their mutual intercourse, calculated upon the relative need of each country, for the supplies of the other? and, if not, whether the relative situation of the two countries, and the nature of their respective supplies do not enable the United States to demand and enforce a reciprocity? And, whether political considerations do not combine in recommending the measure at the present moment? It is expected that the propositions, if carried into effect, would eventuate either in a commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain upon terms of reciprocity; or in a commercial conflict between the two nations.

It is to be observed, that doubts have been suggested respecting the advantages of commercial treaties, upon abstract grounds. Commercial treaties are admitted to be the creatures of the selfish and jealous policy of nations.

It would be a desirable thing for mankind, if there existed but one commercial treaty, common to all nations; and that this treaty should be founded upon the principle of a mere interchange of citizenship, for commercial purposes. This arrangement would facilitate the interchange of the various products of the earth, according to the evident will of the Great Author of Nature. In the execution of such interchange, good faith, enterprise, and industry, would find their true reward. This benefit to mankind can never be expected, so long as the rights (as they are called) of despots shall be more respected and practiced upon than the Rights of Man. It is the knowledge, in despots, of their own usurpations, and their fears of detection, which interdict this great benefit to man. Hence, commercial treaties have become necessary, to reciprocate the advantages of the interchange of the products of the contracting nations, by relaxing the principle of restrictions. To test the advantages of commercial treaties, in the existing state of things, it would be proper to inquire what would be the effect of a single nation which should acquiesce under restrictions, whilst all other nations imposed them?

One evident effect would be a complete monopoly of the carrying trade. Another effect would be, a change in the internal direction of labor. This effect would be produced by unequal duties upon different species of products.

If the trade of the acquiescing nation should be monopolized by any one imposing nation, an irresistible influence would be gained upon the internal administration of the Government of the acquiescing nation. It is not ascertained how far this may be the relative situation of the United States and Great Britain at this moment. It is admitted she has monopolized one-half of our trade; she has a mercantile capital, operating from the extremes of New Hampshire to the extremes of Georgia; and agents engaged in the management of it. Intimate connections are formed between them and our citizens. Hence, he was inclined to think, that an insensible foreign influence was operating, at this moment, upon our councils.

In this state of things, necessity and self-preservation dictate the measure of restrictions to counteract opposing restrictions, or a commercial treaty, calculated to remedy their ill effects.

To test the first inquiry, whether, in the present state of things, the United States do reciprocate with Great Britain in the commercial advantages arising from their mutual intercourse, calculated upon the relative need of each country, for the supplies of the other, he presented a statement which had been relied upon by the gentleman who introduced the propositions, showing, in round numbers, the total tonnage, and seamen employed in the intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, with the proportion thereof employed by each nation. This statement had reference to the year 1792, and if it were not critically correct, it was at least as favorable to the United States, as truth would warrant.

The whole amount of tonnage, 222,000; the whole amount of seamen, 13,320. Of these totals, the British employed 156,000; the United States, 66,000 tons. The British employed 9,360 seamen; the United States employed 3,960 seamen. This is a most striking view of the subject, and if there be not some peculiar quality in the articles of which this intercourse is composed, to justify this state of things, he should conclude, that there is not an equal participation in the advantages of mutual intercourse; and, instead of finding anything from the nature of the articles constituting the trade to justify the inequality, every consideration from that source serves to aggravate the inequality.

The whole trade of the United States to the British West India Dominions, is a complete monopoly in favor of Britain; of course, an equal participation in that part of the trade was not contended. If, then, the United States do not participate equally in the advantages of their intercourse with Great Britain, it is proper to inquire whether the nature of their supplies, and their present political situation, do not enable them to demand and enforce a reciprocity? The supplies of the United States to Britain, consist either of articles for re-exportation, or rude fabrics for manufactures.

The articles of supply from Great Britain, to the United States, are for their own consumption; and the great proportion, at least in point of value, consists of luxuries.

Great Britain is incompetent to her own supply of subsistence, and is every day becoming more incompetent. The gentleman from South Carolina proved this fact to the Committee by an official undeniable document. He relied upon the fact, to prove that Great Britain will hereafter become a better customer to the United States. He seemed unaware that it established a more important point; that she is becoming a more dependent customer. This is one of the most important considerations afforded by the whole subject; it is the principal one which would give the turn to his vote. He made two very interesting reflections from it; the one, that continual increase of debt, and paper machinery, will not produce a correspondent increase of ability in the nation to feed itself. That an infinity of paper will not produce an infinity of food. The other, that proportioned to the inability of Great Britain to feed herself, will be her dependence upon a nation who can feed her. The United States furnish an abundant supply of subsistence for herself, and will shortly be able to feed the increasing wants of Great Britain.

In Great Britain, every species of occupation and employment is not only filled, but overcharged. Her subjects, as was emphatically remarked by the gentleman who preceded him, were compelled to plough the ocean for subsistence. Hence, the difficulty of changing the direction of labor.

In the United States, agriculture, the primary occupation of man, is not yet filled; hence, the facility of changing the direction of labor.

One-sixth of the whole exported manufactures of Great Britain finds a market and consumption in the United States; at least 50,000 hands are employed in making this supply: stop the consumption, and examine the effect. The gentleman who preceded him is of opinion, that no great effect can be expected from so trivial a cause. If he would reflect that the nation is incompetent to her own supply of subsistence; is growing still more so, and that every occupation is overcharged, depriving 50,000 persons of the means of subsistence would not be a trivial cause. In such a state of things it would be a great cause, which might produce great effects.

Great Britain, tottering under the weight of a King, a Court, a nobility, a priesthood, armies, navies, debts, and all the complicated machinery of oppression, which serves to increase the number of unproductive, and lessen the number of productive hands, (the true source of the inability of the nation to feed herself,) at this moment engaged in a foreign war; taxation, already carried to the ultimatum of financial device; the ability of the people already displayed in the payment of taxes, constituting a political phenomenon; all prove the debility of the system, and the decrepitude of old age. On the other hand, the United States, in the flower of youth, increasing in hands, increasing in wealth; and, although an imitative policy has unfortunately prevailed in the erection of a funded debt, in the establishment of an army, anticipating a navy, and all the paper machinery for increasing the number of unproductive hands; yet, the operations of natural causes have, as yet, in some degree, counterbalanced their influence, and still furnish a great superiority, in comparison with Great Britain.

There is another interesting fact, which ought to be considered; the expensive machinery of the British Government has produced a necessity for revenue, which exceeds the ability of her whole internal resources; her Navigation Act taxes all nations for a portion of her revenue; she is indebted to the acquiescence of other nations for its products, rather than to her own ability to enforce it.

It has been said and repeated, that the Navigation Act of Great Britain is irresistible. He believed no serious experiment had ever been made upon it, and no reason has been assigned for the assertion. He could see no peculiar quality attached to that act, to distinguish it from any other act, or to render it more irresistible; nor should he believe it possessed such a peculiar quality, without it could be pointed out, and made visible. But, if such be the quality of a Navigation Act, why would not a Navigation Act, passed by the United States, be equally irresistible? It would certainly counteract the force of the British Navigation Act.

gation Act, so far as it taxes the United States; and this example to other nations might be attended with serious effects to Great Britain in the present forced state of things in that Government.
